PREFACE

The publication Foreign Relations of the United States constitutes the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. The volumes in the series include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions of the United States together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. Documents in the files of the Department of State are supplemented by papers from other Government agencies involved in the formulation of foreign policy.

The basic documentary diplomatic record printed in the volumes of the series Foreign Relations of the United States is edited by the Office of the Historian, Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State. The editing is guided by the principles of historical objectivity and in accordance with the following official guidance first promulgated by Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg on March 26, 1925.

There may be no alteration of the text, no deletions without indicating where in the text the deletion is made, and no omission of facts which were of major importance in reaching a decision. Nothing may be omitted for the purpose of concealing or glossing over what might be regarded by some as a defect of policy. However, certain omissions of documents are permissible for the following reasons:

> a. To avoid publication of matters which would tend to impede current diplomatic negotiations or other business.
> b. To condense the record and avoid repetition of needless details.
> c. To preserve the confidence reposed in the Department by individuals and by foreign governments.
> d. To avoid giving needless offense to other nationalities or individuals.
> e. To eliminate personal opinions presented in despatches and not acted upon by the Department. To this consideration there is one qualification—in connection with major decisions it is desirable, where possible, to show the alternative presented to the Department before the decision was made.

Documents selected for publication in the Foreign Relations volumes are referred to the Department of State Classification/Declassification Center for declassification clearance. The Center reviews the documents, makes declassification decisions, and obtains the clearance of geographic and functional bureaus of the Department of State, as well as of other appropriate agencies of the government. The Center, in coordination with the geographic bureaus of the Department of State, conducts communications with foreign governments regarding documents or information of those governments proposed for inclusion in Foreign Relations volumes.

John P. Glennon supervised the preparation of this volume. Ralph R. Goodwin assisted in the initial planning. Paul Claussen prepared the section on the Arab-Israeli conflict. Carl N. Raether compiled the section on Egypt. The remainder of the volume was done by Joan M. Lee. Mr. Claussen and Nina J. Noring assisted in declassification and final editing.

Until his retirement in 1979, Deputy Historian Fredrick Aandahl directed the entire Foreign Relations project, including the preparation of this volume.

The Documentary Editing Section performed technical editing under the supervision of Margie R. Wilber and Rita M. Baker in the Publishing Services Division (Paul M. Washington, Chief). The Twin Oaks Indexing Collective prepared the index.

THE VISIT OF SECRETARY OF STATE JOHN FOSTER DULLES AND MUTUAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATOR HAROLD STASSEN TO THE NEAR AND MIDDLE EAST, MAY 9-29, 1953

Editorial Note

A memorandum dated December 17, 1952, from John D. Jernegan to the Acting Secretary of State, reported he had heard the future Secretary of State might be planning some extensive travel after January 20 to the Far East and Europe, but not to the Near East and South Asia. He suggested pointing out to future Secretary of State Dulles "the serious adverse effect such an omission would have on the peoples living between Morocco and Burma." Since he considered a number of problems in the NEA area of worldwide importance, Jernegan recommended that the Acting Secretary "suggest to Mr. Dulles that visits by him to Cairo, Karachi and New Delhi would not only be useful in rounding out his global picture but would have real importance in our relations with that part of the world." (110.11 DU/12-1752)

Telegram 511 from Damascus, January 23, 1953, urged that consideration be given by the new Secretary of State to including some Near East capitals in his forthcoming visits to Europe, India, and Pakistan. It advised that "stops at Cairo, Riyadh, Tel Aviv and Damascus would permit rapid survey key issues affecting US position in area, including: (1) Arab-Israeli relations; (2) Palestine refugee problem; (3) Anglo-Egyptian question; (4) Middle East defense; (5) US stake in area oil." [1] Sent to Cairo, Jidda, New Delhi, Karachi, Beirut, Baghdad, Damascus, Amman, Tel Aviv, Tripoli, and Dhahran.

[2] Circular telegram 911, Feb. 28, advised the same Embassies and Consulates to stress that the Secretary of State's visit would be informal and it was desired that entertainment be kept to a minimum. (110.11 DU/2-2853)

[3] Circular telegram 936, Mar. 9, reported that because of leaks about the Secretary's forthcoming trip he had issued a statement at a press conference that day. The statement pointed out that the trip was being made at the request of the President, and its purpose was to gather facts rather than make specific proposals. "As first Secretary of State to visit some of these countries, sees trip as opportunity to dispel misunderstanding and to develop closer relations between US and these friendly nations." (110.11 DU/3-953) The text of the Mar. 9 press release is printed in Department of State Bulletin, Mar. 23, 1953, p. 431.

Circular telegram 944, Mar. 11, advised Embassies and Consulates that publicity treating the Secretary's forthcoming trip should emphasize, among other things, the fact that he would be the first Secretary of State to visit those countries and he looked on the trip as an opportunity to dispel misunderstandings and develop close relations between the United States and friendly nations.

In making approach explain purpose trip make personal contact with Near East and Asian leaders and obtain first-hand information.

New Delhi and Karachi only: At your discretion you may mention that Secretary does not plan take up question "Asian Defense Pact".

Foreign Minister Fawzi welcomed the American group. The Secretary replied that he and his party were happy to be in Cairo and said that if we met more frequently with other countries, and had closer contact, it would be a good thing. The US has contractual arrangements with other countries regarding defense (NATO) but he would like the Foreign Minister to know that it has equal concern for Egypt. His party was here to find out what Egypt thinks of the problems which are also of concern to the US and what the US can do to help Egypt. The US is very much concerned with the Suez Base negotiations [2] and would be glad to have any thoughts which the Egyptians wished to put forward.

The Foreign Minister opened his statement by speaking of the warm feeling of Egypt for Ambassador Caffery "who knows us so well". He was sure that the Ambassador must have reported how Egypt looks to the US as a world leader. "Our corner of the world" is striving to get on its feet and to make the area strong. It must overcome the weaknesses that are a temptation to aggression. Social and economic problems are as important as political problems. The agricultural reform law is an example of the kind of project which Egypt has in mind. He referred to the Aswan Dam which, he said, would increase the area of arable land by one-third to one-half.

The Secretary interrupted to say that he had talked with Mr. Black of the IBRD and that the latter was definitely interested in the dam project and said he thought he could do something to help. The Foreign Minister said that Egypt was pleased by Mr. Black's useful and instructive visit. Egypt hoped that the new dam would provide both electricity and steel. Another project Egypt had in mind was harnessing the Katarah Depression for electric power. Egypt has just established a new province. Egypt believes that its economic projects are sound. Egypt will have to depend on "friends" for capital and know-how. He said that he was not asking for anything. He was "just giving the picture".

The Foreign Minister then referred to the Anglo-Egyptian "discussions". He said Egypt had approached these discussions in the "shirt-sleeved, American way" and was trying to be constructive. Egypt felt that the difficulties with the UK were "practical matters to be dealt with practically".

It was not realistic to say, however, that there could be any peace, or constructive work in Egypt, so long as British armed forces or "British controlled persons are on our land". The crux of the difficulties in these discussions is that while the UK has conceded that the territory of the base is under Egyptian sovereignty and control (i.e., has agreed regarding the land) the British want "technical management" of the base. The British agree that their installations and facilities will be turned over to Egypt but they insist on "technical management". Egypt is ready to concede that some technicians—even British technicians—can be left behind, but these must be in the employ of the Egyptian Government.

Fawzi said that British objection to their technicians being Egyptian Government employees is that Egypt can hire or fire them. All Egypt can say to the UK on this point is "Have faith in us" and to promise that it would not capriciously hire and fire.

The Foreign Minister referred to London's desire to have direct communication with the technicians in the base. He said that as a matter of sovereignty Egypt must insist that communications to the technicians take place through the Egyptian Government and Egyptian authorities.

The Foreign Minister said that if good faith and no hidden, unacceptable policies are involved, it would be surprising if Egypt and the UK cannot agree. However, Egypt cannot accept what Egypt conceives as a definite infringement on Egyptian sovereignty.

What Egypt can accept is a minimum number of British experts in the base as Egyptian employees and under Egyptian control for a limited time until Egyptians are trained.

The UK point of view is that British technicians must remain in the base in control of British property so long as British property exists there. This is an important point for Egypt: Egypt cannot see the equipment used as a pretext for outside control on Egyptian soil.

Speaking solemnly, the Foreign Minister said that time is not entirely at Egypt's service or command. Public opinion evolves and cannot be stopped by driving nails into it: "The less time we lose the better is the hope of a solution."

In connection with any signed agreement, he was reminded of a "famous piece of paper"—the MEDO proposals.[3] He said that MEDO is now "definitely out of focus". "There are sometimes a profound difference between signed papers and the nature of things". He said "Perhaps we are not Communists now. We do not want to be, but this situation might change."

The Foreign Minister said that the US would have to take Egypt's word that Egypt's strength would not be used against the Western world but against aggressors from "other quarters". However, if too much of a formal undertaking is now put on paper this might touch off difficulties.

He wished to reiterate that as long as the UK insists on its position regarding the base there is no hope of an agreement.

Before answering any questions the Secretary might like to ask, the Foreign Minister said he had two other items he would like to mention.

He was informed that his friends were very worried about the Secretary accepting an invitation to lunch at Jerusalem since this to some extent vitiated the fine US stand regarding the internationalization of Jerusalem.

The Foreign Minister then returned to his earlier theme.

He said the Egyptians do not expect miracles. They would like to see the US measure up to its role of leadership which the US cannot escape. He said he could not conceive of the Arab Moslem people being happy so long as the UK holds its present position in Egypt. He said that the choice for the UK is (a) holding on to the base against the will of the people or (b) befriending the people and thus having their willing cooperation at all times. The Foreign Minister said he was not a military expert. (The Secretary interjected that both he and the Foreign Minister had military men as their bosses.) He believed that a base held against the will of the population was of little use.

The Foreign Minister said that Egypt was anxious to build up Egypt and Egyptian strength. It believes in self-help and is willing to spend up to its capacity on social and economic reforms. It hopes that interested friends will contribute the difference between what Egypt can supply and what is needed. However, this cannot be done in such a way as to infringe the sovereignty or rights of the Egyptian people.

The Foreign Minister said that the last meeting of the Arab League resolved to put the Arab League Collective Security Pact into operation and to strengthen it. All Arab States are trying to build up their economic and social strengths and success in these two fields is the best source of national strength. Just as Egypt has in mind many real projects, so too does the rest of the Arab world. The Arab League is considering the idea of a network of international roads in the area. Very importantly, there will be a meeting of the Arab League Finance Ministers next month. One item on their agenda will be the establishment of an Arab Investment Bank.

The Foreign Minister said he wished to remind the Secretary that as long as present conditions in and around Israel (he used the word "Palestine") continue, it is beyond the bounds of possibility that real peace will exist in the Middle East. The refugees represent a terrible human and social problem. Moreover, not only had Palestine been partitioned—the Arab world had been partitioned by Israel.

The Foreign Minister said that either now, or in the future, Egypt was always open to constructive ideas as to how it might contribute to world peace and stability. He was aware of the many anti-Communist measures undertaken by the US but he said that many people feel that delay in solving the problems in the Middle East in a decent way is one of the best ways to make Communists. Situations produced attitudes.

He asked for questions.

The Secretary said that in regard to Jerusalem he would like to make it clear there is no political significance to his visit there. To him, as a Christian, Jerusalem is a very sacred place which he had long wanted to see. He did not know exactly who he would see there but Jerusalem was only incidental to his visit to the area generally. (The Foreign Minister said he had mentioned Jerusalem "only as a friend".)

The Secretary said he had no idea that political implications would be attached to his visit to Jerusalem. Personally, he had always believed in a large measure of internationalization and had always adhered to the broad lines of this UN Resolution.

The Foreign Minister inquired whether he would be seeing any Arabs in Jerusalem.

The Secretary said he would try to see some Arabs.

The Foreign Minister said that the Arab friends of the US would not like to see the US lose credit for blocking the transfer to Jerusalem of the capital of Israel.

The Secretary said that he was not criticizing the past President or his Administration. The Administration to which he belonged was trying to work out a Middle Eastern policy on the basis of enlightened self-interest of the US as a whole. "I do not mean self-interest of particular groups of Americans." The Foreign Minister might rest assured that if anything happens inconsistent to what he had just said, the Administration would try "to keep the scales in balance".

The Foreign Minister said that he welcomed these assurances and hoped that there would be few "accidents".

The Secretary said he would be interested in knowing the exact status of the present negotiations with the UK.

The Foreign Minister replied "at the sixth and so far the last meeting" the UK and Egypt had exchanged draft proposals and counterproposals. After this the UK had come to the Egyptians and said the British Government would not accept the Egyptian proposals. He said that the UK seemed to think that some reply should be made by Egypt; "Our position is that we have already given the British our answer in the negotiations."

The Foreign Minister said he would like to stress the fact that what is involved is Egyptian sovereignty. He did not feel it was a matter of words. It was a matter of fundamental position. Egypt would never accept non-Egyptian experts here "in control of anything". Egypt believed in efficiency and felt that it must work out a way so that efficiency and sovereignty could go together.

The Secretary said that "sovereignty" is a very difficult word.

The Foreign Minister interrupted to say that he was "not talking about books" and the definition of sovereignty which would be found in books.

The Secretary said that in a sense every treaty signed by a country infringes its sovereignty: no individual and no nation are ever entirely sovereign. He said that in the UK, where the US has bases, US technicians get US orders and this is as it should be.

The Foreign Minister warned against the danger of comparisons. England was England and Egypt was Egypt. The Egyptian people would never accept it. Already the Egyptian Government had "taken a great deal on itself" in agreeing to permit some British technicians to remain.

The Secretary cited as an example a British or a US firm located in Egypt. He was sure that such a firm could receive direct communications from its home office. He had in mind a firm like the Ford Motor Company. The Foreign Minister replied that no one could say that the Ford Motor Company is infringing Egyptian sovereignty.

The Secretary referred to the great quantities of stores in the base which were the property of the UK. He could not see how these stores could be useful if not under the instructions from their owner.

The Foreign Minister said that Egypt was prepared to accept the idea that the directives should come from London but it was important that they pass through Egyptian hands. The Egyptians could work out a system whereby they could be passed on promptly.

It being 4:55 the conference broke up to proceed to the Presidency where General Naguib was waiting.

After the taking of many photographs in the Prime Minister's private office the party adjourned to the Council Room of the Presidency. There the Secretary presented the Prime Minister with a 32 automatic, a personal gift from General Eisenhower to the Prime Minister. (This presentation was intended to be in private but the last photographer leaving the room glimpsed the pistol and thereupon all returned and photographed the Prime Minister with the pistol in his hand.)

The Prime Minister said that he had again to thank the Secretary for kindnesses. He appreciated the letter from General Eisenhower just delivered [2] as he had appreciated the previous letter from the General, and now he wished to thank him for the pistol. The Prime Minister said it was great a honor to have in Cairo such important personalities. He hoped very much that those present would help to resolve the problems facing Egypt. He was grateful for the Secretary's kind words at the airport. All Egyptians appreciate it and want to be friends with the US.

Egypt is doing its best to reform the country in every way. It is trying to make economic, social and political progress so that it can take a major part in preserving the peace of the world. The objective is to make Egypt a "a good nation and a peaceful nation".

The Prime Minister said these efforts at reform are greatly hindered by the aggression of the British in Egypt. He hoped that the Secretary would tolerate frankness; he would expect the same frankness from the Secretary.

The Prime Minister said that the Egyptian Government has only achieved part of its program but it is making headway in reconciling differences between rich and poor, in trying to make the state genuinely democratic and to give people liberty. It had many ideas for bettering the economic and social life of the country. For example, there was the new high dam and the electrification of the old Aswan Dam. He was sure that the Secretary knew about the law for the division of agricultural land. These and many other measures are designed to raise living standards of the Egyptians and to "make the people feel happy". If the people feel happy this will be a natural defense against bad social life. British occupation and British stubbornness are "blocking our liberty" and are arousing the people who want liberty.

[2] Not further identified.

America has always been considered as the leader of liberty and the friend of weak nations; as the country most sympathetic and willing to help smaller states achieve their national aspirations.

Unforturnately the high standing of the United States has deteriorated in the eyes of the Arab world as a result of the Palestine situation. Originally the Arab peoples felt bitterness only against the UK. Now the Arabs feel that the UK has shifted some of the burden of bitterness on the shoulders of the US. The Arabs have before them always the plight of the refugees who are living under very difficult circumstances. Egypt has Arab refugees in Gaza where life is very hard.

The Egyptians, and the Arabs generally, feel that the US has always favored Israel and this is the cause of bad feeling against the US. The Prime Minister wanted to point out the fact that Egyptian public opinion is alarmed and afraid whenever they hear of entering into a pact regarding Middle East defense involving the US and the UK. Egypt has had bitter experience with many agreements with the UK which have not been kept by the UK. He mentioned the agreement of 1922 and the agreement of 1926. He said that the latter required the UK to give Egypt a modern army but the resulting army was "fit only for funeral celebrations". Further evidence of British bad faith was the recent agreement on the Sudan: only one week after this was signed British officials began to go against the "essence of the agreement".

The result of this bad experience is that everybody is afraid of pacts and agreements. There is a feeling that no agreements can be "respectable" unless they are made between equals. Agreements made on the basis of a master-slave relationship are of no use. The Prime Minister said "If I feel oppressed (as all of the people do) there is no point in making an agreement". He said that the people's will would have to be respected. The people are now so suspicious that they will not consider any agreement on defense until they "find themselves free".

According to the Prime Minister there is a great need to establish confidence between Egypt and the UK. In this connection he welcomed US interest but he felt that Egypt would have to protect its position. He said that the US is so powerful that it "can do anything". (This point was somewhat obscure; the Prime Minister appeared to mean that if the US were to use all the means at its disposal it could force the Egyptians to make an agreement.) It must be recognized, however, that "if I say I will make a pact I will lose all my supporters." This being so, the Prime Minister said, he must first eliminate all the hindrances which will prevent compliance with any agreement made. Once liberty is achieved "the people will be willing to have confidence in anybody—even the UK".

The Prime Minister then said that defense of Egypt is Egypt's responsibility which Egypt is anxious to undertake with both strength and enthusiasm. However, no matter how many troops are brought in by the UK to the Suez Base they will "never be safe" from the 22 million Egyptians who see them as aggressors. He said that he must be frank; the present situation might get even worse. "What I can do with the British now I may not be able to do in a month or two."

The Prime Minister said that Foreign Minister Fawzi could explain the trend in the discussions with the UK which had already taken place. The UK had told the Egyptian Government that it was going to withdraw and suggested the establishment of four committees to study the problem: (a) Withdrawal Committee, (b) Base Committee, (c) Air Defense Committee, and (d) Equipment Committee. It was only in connection with (b) that the Prime Minister saw any grave difficulty. This committee was to study the maintenance of the base. The British had originally suggested that the Base Committee should begin its work without terms of reference. The Egyptians had insisted on broad lines of principles for its guidance. The British insisted on British technicians to manage British equipment installations. The Egyptian position is that Egypt must have full control of the base by Egyptians because otherwise this would be an infringement of Egypt's sovereignty.

He was sorry that the UK kept harping on formulas and refused to look at the facts. "Nobody can accept an arrangement of the kind suggested by the British and that is all there is to be said."

The Prime Minister said that he is eager to settle the question of the base so that his hands would be free to deal with internal reforms. The people have such a lack of confidence, however, that they will not listen now to the idea of a defense arrangement. In 1950 the Arab League Collective Security Pact was set up. He thought this might be developed into "something good".

The Prime Minister returned to the point made several times earlier. He said no government in any Arab country can now go against the will of the people, who "hate the British" and feel bitter against the US (and to some extent France) for helping the UK. The Prime Minister asked rhetorically, "Free us from the British occupation and we can then negotiate in good faith". At present, however, "All our minds and feelings" are aroused against the UK. This same energy could be turned to making arrangements for Egypt's defense. The Prime Minister said that no country can stand alone and thus it will behoove Egypt to look about for friends. "Russia is not our friend".

The Prime Minister said that all the Arab States have their own problems and that all of the Arab States are waiting for Egypt to solve the Anglo-Egyptian problem. He was certain that a solution of the Egyptian problem will achieve "what you want and what we want" in the other Arab States.

Israel represents a continuing problem but he thought that "something might be done" towards a just solution once Egypt's quarrel with the British is settled. What he had in mind would involve the defense of the Arab States and the establishment of land communication between Egypt and the Arab States.

The Prime Minister said that "bad consequences" were certain to follow a failure to agree with the UK. This would adversely affect his government and perhaps another revolution would take place with incalculable results. His regime had attacked the evils of bribery and corruption and the people, particularly in the country, are happy. They now have great expectations of his government but unless "the source of all our ills" is removed (i.e., British forces) he would not hide from the Secretary the fact that January 26 might be repeated.[3] If it were repeated there would be chaos and it would be the kind of chaos which "the British, the Communists, and others, who have an interest in chaos, could exploit".

The Prime Minister said he understood the US looks favorably upon the RCC. Already however the Communists are now saying that the RCC is selling out Egypt to the UK at US behest. The Prime Minister said that he welcomed aid and money from the US but in connection with the latter the Egyptians remember and fear a repetition of 1886 when the British came in to collect the debts of Khedive Ismail. He implied that Egypt could not expose itself to the same danger vis-à-vis the US. The Prime Minister said that if the RCC were to fall, bitterness would increase in all the capitals of the Arab States where they are waiting to see what will happen in Egypt. He wished to repeat again that the essence of any future agreement is confidence.

The Prime Minister said that he could not imagine why the British "want to retain a finger here". Perhaps the reason is explained by the story of "Goha's Nail". This was an old Egyptian story.

[3] For documentation on the Cairo riots of Jan. 26, 1952, see Documents 956 ff.

Goha sold his house to a friend, stipulating however that one nail on an interior wall of the house remained his property. No sooner had the new owner moved in than Goha showed up to make certain that his nail was safe. He paid repeated visits at all hours of the day and night to examine his property. The result was that a) the new owner went crazy because of these visits; b) Goha married his wife and c) got back the house he had sold.

The Prime Minister said rather than have a case of Goha's Nail, he would prefer that the British "take all their equipment and go". The Prime Minister said he had nothing more to say.

The Secretary said that he was very grateful for the Prime Minister's remarks which were just the kind of plain talk that he and Mr. Stassen had come to hear. It was always important to know how other people feel.

The Secretary said that the new administration is now in the process of making up its mind what its new foreign policy should be. When it took over it was faced by existing foreign policies—some good, some less good. All US foreign policies are being reviewed and this process may take another three months to complete. The President had asked the Secretary and Mr. Stassen to make this trip. The President was sending his brother (whom the Secretary himself might join later) to study the situation in Latin America. It is an important fact that foreign policies cannot be made in Washington without a knowledge of what is in the minds of other people.

The Secretary could say now, however, that the new Administration's policies will be based on the Communist threat. The Communists already rule one-third of the world. He referred to Communist activity in Indo-China as evidence that Communists seek further expansion. He wanted the Prime Minister to know the US view that nothing has happened to change the philosophy of the Communists. The death of Stalin did not change Communist philosophy which, like a religious creed, keeps on and on. Faced with the Communist threat, the US naturally seeks the help of others. The US considers the Middle East to be a danger area which heretofore has been somewhat neglected by the US. It is the area from which great religions and much culture have sprung. In the past the US has perhaps centered too much of its interest on Israel as a result of pressure groups in the US. The new Administration is seeking a balanced view of the Middle East directed against neither the Arabs nor the Jews.

Evidence of the new Administration's concern with the problems of the Middle East is the presence in Cairo, at the President's direction, of the Secretary and Mr. Stassen.

The Secretary wished to make clear that what happens in Egypt is up to the Egyptians. The US cannot dictate to Egypt. Power must come from the people themselves. Nevertheless he would like the Prime Minister to know when the new Administration had studied world strategy in the Department of State and in the National Security Council they had concluded that Egypt is the country in the Middle East which, under the leadership and guidance of the Prime Minister, contains the promise of a great future. President Eisenhower himself has high regard for the Prime Minister and what he is doing. The President believes that the Prime Minister is giving exactly the kind of leadership which has been lacking in the Arab world for so long. The leadership of the Prime Minister gives an opportunity to effect in Egypt economic improvements—in agriculture, in industry, in irrigation, etc. It also contains the potential for the possible strengthening of the armed forces of Egypt.

So far as arms are concerned there is a desperate need for American arms in Laos and other places in the Far East as well as in Europe. It will not be easy for the US to assist Egypt with arms. However, if arms, and economic help are justified in the case of Egypt, and if Egypt itself desires these things from the US, the US would be prepared to consider making the Egyptian Army a real force in the world.

The Secretary said it was not possible for the US to help everybody. Consequently the US must follow a selective policy. As the US sees the situation, Egypt has great possibilities for the future not only for itself but as an example for others to follow.

The Secretary said that he was sure that the US vision of the new and greater Egypt was only a pale replica of the Prime Minister's vision. However, he would like the Prime Minister to know that the imagination of the American people had been caught by what the Prime Minister is trying to do. President Eisenhower would like closer ties with Egypt in the military and economic spheres and had asked the Secretary to ascertain from the Prime Minister his ideas in this regard.

Anglo-Egyptian differences represented a real problem for the US.

The US is not ashamed of its close ties of alliance with the UK and makes no effort to disguise these ties. The Secretary said that sometimes the US has its differences with the UK but these it tries to solve quietly. The US does not automatically accept British policy. One hundred and sixty years ago the US started on the road of independent policies and this would continue. However, the US and UK do agree on general broad principles. "We share with the UK cultural and religious traditions and these give us a similar point of view on most problems while maintaining the right to exercise in all instances entirely independent judgment. It was wrong for people to say that the UK led the US by the nose."

(The Prime Minister said that he did not think that the UK led the US by the nose.)

The US does not believe in colonialism. The US freed the Philippines and gave up special rights that it had one time possessed in Cuba. The US does not believe that certain peoples and races have the right to determine the fate of other peoples.

So far as the Suez Base is concerned the Secretary had discussed this in Washington with Mr. Eden in March. The previous Administration had done the same thing. In Washington the US agreed with the UK that there must be a prompt change in the situation which would recognize the sovereignty of Egypt over the Suez Base in theory as well as in fact.

One consideration seemed very important to the US: The change in the status of the base should not affect its usability in war on short notice. No one could afford to have a power vacuum in the base. The Secretary hoped that Egypt would feel, as the US feels, that the technical maintenance must be at a high level of efficiency. The Base contains vast quantities of stores and "unless we are careful in the way we make the change, the value of the base might be destroyed at a very critical moment".

The foreign policy of the new Administration (now in the process of formulation) tries to think ahead for five or ten years. The US believes that the danger in this part of the world is real and present. The Communists do not change their purpose very easily. The Prime Minister would recall that in the Stalin-Hitler conversations of 1940 the USSR claimed as the center of Soviet aspirations the "general area of the Persian Gulf". The Germans objected to this Soviet claim and thus the USSR risked a terrible war for this objective. This happened once; the US believes that it could happen again and that the Middle East might be the next area of danger.

As General to General, President Eisenhower sent the Prime Minister word that he thought the greatest care should be taken not to destroy the utility of the Suez Base which is such a major deterrent to aggression against the Middle East. The President felt that impetuousness must not be allowed to interfere with the operation of the Base.

The Secretary talked with the President several times about this problem—most recently last Friday (May 8). On this occasion the President had told him that "We all agree that the British troops must be evacuated and Egyptian sovereignty be restored but base is great deterrent to aggression. The Base could be the place from which to strike back. Consequently the Base must be preserved without any period of vacuum". Thus, continued the Secretary, the President's message to you is,"Don't create a moment of danger".

The US believes in a phased withdrawal of British troops but at the same time in a base in instant readiness. Readiness in three months or six months might be too late in modern war.

The Secretary said that danger to the Middle East is "more yours than ours". Some people believe that the US has an inescapable interest in the Middle East because of oil. The truth is that the US has surplus oil from Venezuela and can do without Middle Eastern oil. This does not affect, however, the temptation which the great Middle Eastern oil reserves are to the Soviet Union.

The US believes that in the present situation there must be a gradual transition. It is highly important that orders for the handling and management of British equipment in the base be quickly and efficiently executed since this base system is the only effective deterrent in the area today.

The President hopes that the Prime Minister will work to preserve this deterrent.

The Prime Minister said he did not see how a vacuum could take place because Egyptians would take the place of British troops.

The Secretary replied that the US believed that Egyptian troops would protect the Base. The important thing is "the instant availability of the stores and equipment in the base". The management of British stores and equipment by British technicians represents a system which we "do not want to see broken up without adequate replacement". The Secretary hoped that Egypt would move very cautiously in regard to British technicians.

The Prime Minister said that already the Egyptian Air Force has its own technicians to manage its stores. He thought Egyptians could, in time, learn to do the job.

The Secretary replied that he was not in a position to judge the capacity of Egyptians to learn to handle, service, and repair alien material but he would like to know whether the Prime Minister agreed with him regarding instant availability.

The Prime Minister replied that he did agree to instant availability and that Egypt had agreed to be "entrusted" with British stores. Foreign Minister Fawzi intervened to say that Egypt has accepted (a) some British technicians whenever Egyptians not qualified and (b) the principle of efficiency in the base.

The Secretary said he wished to stress the importance the US attaches to the efficiency of the base. Detailed knowledge is very important to the proper handling of the stores. He urged that nothing should be done precipitately.

The Foreign Minister said that the British refused to contemplate their stores ever being cared for and managed by Egyptians.

The Secretary replied that the British might have too low an idea of Egyptian capabilities in this regard.

The Prime Minister said that he did not agree with the UK that a vacuum would follow transfer. Egypt wanted to keep the base in the best possible way. The best deterrent to the USSR would be the spectacle of Egypt working loyally with the UK. If this happened the USSR would never dare attack. He agreed that an efficient base is intrinsic to the defense of Egypt. Nevertheless the British insist that as long as British property is in Egypt it must be handled by British technicians under British control. Why this desire to control? Egypt wanted nothing which "infringes our sovereignty". Egypt would gradually take over the control of the base and would certainly not abuse it. However, if control rested in London "how can I be sure the British will not increase the number of their technicians?"

Mr. Byroade said that he had a question to ask. What was the Egyptian attitude towards exports from the base? He understood that some of the supplies and equipment were processed and exported to Libya, Cyprus, the Arab Legion, etc. How did Egypt feel about this export business?

The Prime Minister said that the contents of the base are British property and that the British can "remove anywhere they like".

At this point the Secretary interjected that "it seemed stupid that ways cannot be found to meet the views of both sides on the matter of technicians". Everyone is agreed regarding the withdrawal of British troops. The Ford dealer in Egypt has a lot equipment, spare parts, etc. He makes repairs, replacements. It requires time for him to train people and yet the fact that he receives instructions from his home office in no way affects Egyptian sovereignty. The Secretary said that the Egyptian Government would have won its "great political victory" with withdrawal of British troops. Could it be that the great vision of a new Egypt could collapse over the problems of a few inventory-keepers?

The Foreign Minister said that a major question of principle "jumps out when we talk of control". The number of British technicians and the number of Egyptians is a matter for the committees to study; it is a matter for fact finding.

The Secretary said that "efficiency" is the key word in thinking of the base.

The Foreign Minister reiterated that he felt the best manner to set up control would be to have this made the subject of study by the Base Committee. He agreed that it was ridiculous that negotiations should break down over inventory-keepers. He failed to see why the British should be so insistent on this point.

The Secretary said it would be a crime against humanity if the two parties could not solve the "last remnant of the problem".

The Egyptian Ambassador to Washington intervened at this point. He said that while he was Secretary for Social Affairs 46,000 Egyptians had left the base. During the war thousands of technicians were employed by the UK and the US. He was thus certain that Egypt can find the technicians. (Note: This statement by the Egyptian Ambassador may be a clue to a genuine misunderstanding. To him technicians meant machinists, mechanics, and other skilled trades. The UK, which employed up to 80,000 Egyptians in the Base previously, expects to use Egyptians for skilled trades—the more the better. The British point turns upon "technical management" at a high level.)

The Secretary said that he had not come to Egypt to involve himself in the negotiations. He was primarily interested in the potential role of Egypt in the future. He looked forward to talking with the Prime Minister again about the "big picture". He was sure that the Prime Minister fully appreciated that the US cannot equip Egyptians to fight the British. It was thus important to get the Anglo-Egyptian dispute out of the way so that the US could discuss with Egypt economic aid and such other important matters as peace with Israel and collective security. On the latter point he was coming more and more to feel that the original MEDO proposal no longer meets the situation and is outdated. He thought that something else could be found.

The Prime Minister replied that everything depends on confidence. The Jews have frequently ignored or broken UN Resolutions. Egypt is even now prepared to plan informally with the US. The Prime Minister said that "after the British get out I am sure that I can reach an agreement with Israel". The Secretary must always bear in mind his political difficulties. Already he is charged with throwing Egypt into the arms of the US.

As the meeting was about to break up an aide brought to the Prime Minister an early ticker account of Prime Minister Churchill's speech [4] before the House of Commons the same day. This the Prime Minister read aloud but made no sustantive comment upon it.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Cairo [1]

SECRET

CAIRO, May 12, 1953—12:15 p. m.

ST D-1/2

Subject: Egypt

Participants:

United States
Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State
Honorable Douglas MacArthur II, State Department Counselor
Honorable Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary of State
Lieutenant Colonel Stephen Meade, United States Army
Ambassador Caffery
Mr. G. Lewis Jones
Mr. Howard Elting
Mr. William Lakeland

Egypt
Colonel Abd Al Nasir
Major Abdel Hakim Amir
Major Salah Salim
Wing Commander Abd Al Latif Baghdady

The Secretary opened the conversation by saying that he was delighted to see the representatives of the RCC and to have a chance to exchange views with them. The Secretary felt that he understood the Egyptian point of view better than when he had arrived, but that he still had much to learn. He would like to say a few words of general character.

The Secretary would like the RCC representatives to know that the US has a real enthusiasm for the new regime in Egypt which has done so much to introduce honesty into public life. The US would like to be of help in the work of the new regime, but, of course, it does not wish to intrude its help. The Secretary had a long talk with Mr. Black of the IBRD who told him that he was genuinely interested in helping Egypt with a loan. The Secretary was glad to hear this, because he felt that an international fund like the IBRD should be available to help deserving countries.

As he had done to the Prime Minister the previous day, the Secretary said that there had been high-level meetings in Washington to decide where US financial aid could be best employed. It was impossible to help everybody and, consequently, it seemed wise to choose "a few key positions". Egypt is one of the countries "we would like to help with military supplies and equipment" because we feel that Egypt now has the leadership which could cause Egypt to set an example to the other Arab States, where there has been so much weakness during the past few decades.

[1] This conversation took place in the U.S. Embassy.

The Secretary said that the Administration had asked Congress to appropriate economic assistance for the Middle East in a lump sum somewhat larger than that of last year and without specific separation between the Arab States and Israel. So far the reception of the Congress had been favorable.

The Secretary said that it was interesting to note that the Republican Administration does not owe the same degree of political debt as did the Democrats to Jewish groups.

The Secretary said that he thought the Washington situation was such that it could lead to the improvement of US relations with all democratic countries. So far as Egypt is concerned, there was one thing to be cleared up—the presence of the British forces in Egypt. The Secretary understood that the withdrawal of British forces was now assured in almost all respects. Only a few residual elements remained. It was now settled that the British troops will evacuate Egypt, and Egypt's sovereignty will be fully recognized.

What remains undecided is the question of custody—the utilization—the direction—of the depots in the base which "are so important in the absence of other arrangements for area defense". The depots are a "material basis" for area defense, and from the US standpoint they form a vital part of the strategic picture in this part of the world. The depots must be well managed, and their contents must be available for use in Cyprus, Jordan, etc.

The US would like to see area defense established. The more the Secretary thought about MEDO the less well he thought it was adapted to meet the case. It involves too many non-area countries. The Egyptians, themselves, have proposed some form of area defense system.

In sum, it is the US feeling that:

a. British troops should evacuate and Egyptian sovereignty should be fully restored.

b. The present mechanics for the defense of the area (i.e., the base) should not lapse even for an interim period.

It could not be denied that the armies of the Arab States are weak. The US thinks that the custody and direction of the depots should be retained, so that these can be used, even under present defense plans.

The Secretary said that, as he had told the Prime Minister yesterday, the US has no desire to back the UK in "imperialism" or "colonialism". The US wants to see Egypt free. The depots are, however, a complicating factor. They cannot be shifted. A way must be found to use the depots as a "backlog for strategic plans" for the time being until Egyptian leadership produces a group or association which will make the area safe. The US hopes that this will not take very long.

No country can stand alone. Even the US must participate in mutual defense groupings. An Association of American States helps to protect the Panama Canal. The Secretary said, "We beg you not to demand a degree of control over the actual supplies in the base which will handicap their usefulness for defense."

The Secretary said he would like to know the solution of the problem foreseen by the officers present.

(Note: From this point it was extremely difficult to take notes because the officers (particularly Nasir) spoke in low voices. The following is only an approximation of the conversation.)

Nasir said that Egypt is faced with the problem of confidence. He thought that the objectives of the US and Egypt are the same; Egypt, too, would like to see the defense of the area organized. However, as long as British influence is in Egypt, there is a psychological block to setting up an area defense arrangement. The Egyptian people think of MEDO as a "perpetuation of occupation". The British want "technical control", but he assured the Secretary that if the British are "here under another name", the population would not cooperate. The population must be convinced—must have confidence.

The Secretary asked how long he thought it would take to work out a new organization—a couple of years? Nasir replied that "nobody" would now accept the statement that the UK can be genuine allies of the Arabs. The population of Egypt would think crazy anybody saying this.

The Secretary reminded Nasir that it would be a great thing to have the British forces leave Egypt. Would this not make a big difference?

Nasir replied that British influence must entirely disappear. The RCC must depend upon the cooperation of the people. The people would not cooperate for anything else.

The Secretary said that he understood very well that no government can be strong without the support of the people: by the same token, governments must influence the thinking of the people.

Nasir replied, "We can influence the people on every point except this."

The Secretary reminded Nasir that he would have a great success with the withdrawal of the British forces—the greatest success any government of Egypt had ever had in time of peace. As he had said earlier, it was within the grasp of Egypt to have other successes equally notable in other spheres (economic, social, etc.). It was difficult for him to understand how these successes must depend on the total elimination of any British influence. Would British civilians in the base really represent influence? It seems incredible that Egypt would throw away these successes on such a point.

Nasir said that under the UK ideas Egypt can have "overall control of the base" but that the UK wants "technical control". (The officer outlined the difficulties of this from the point of view of Egypt.)

The Secretary attempted to make a comparison with the "technical control" which the Ford Motor Company has over its factory representative abroad. He said this in no way infringed sovereignty. The company could order the parts it wished and export them where they wished. The base was an analogy to this commercial arrangement.

Nasir said with regard to parts and supplies moving in and out of the base that, "We want the base to be like a bank; the British can put in, and they can take out."

The Secretary said, "Let's be more specific. What do you mean by control? How do you envisage Egyptian control?"

Nasir, in a low voice, said that Egyptians could be trained to do everything the British are now doing.

The Secretary said that it would be "unreasonable and unfortunate" for Egypt to ask for such a degree of control in the absence of any going defense organization. The depots contain vast supplies. The US hopes Egypt will lead the Arab States into a new area defense system (not MEDO, since this was out of date) which, when it is achieved, will find the material in the depots available to it.

Nasir said that Egypt could and would maintain the depots for use at all times.

The Secretary said the US would like to see them maintained until a new organization is available. What the US feared was that a "dead-hand would freeze the equipment in the base for a couple of years." The base must be a living organism with material moving in and out; it was not dead storage. At this juncture of world affairs no one could afford dead storage.

Mr. Byroade said that he had a question about exports from the base. Was he correct in believing that the Egyptians wanted to be in the military communication channel through which orders regarding the supplies would move?

The gist of the Egyptian reply was that they did not have exactly this in mind.

Mr. MacArthur inquired whether the British know that it is the Egyptian idea that they will be free to ship supplies anywhere at any time.

The gist of the Egyptian reply was that the British had been told.

Mr. Byroade said it was difficult for him to understand how the question of sovereignty could be affected by the movement of direct telegrams regarding supplies from the UK to the base.

The Secretary said that the Ford Motor Company did not communicate its orders through the Egyptian Foreign Office.

Mr. MacArthur recapitulated. He said that the Egyptians had said the UK would be free to move the stuff where and when it likes, and that after evacuation starts, Egypt will be ready to start planning. The UK has a real public opinion problem of its own. Can the UK say that Egypt has agreed to the free movement of supplies in and out of the base? The Egyptians answered "yes". Mr. MacArthur then inquired whether the UK could say that Egypt will be prepared after evacuation starts to undertake area defense planning with the UK. The Egyptian answer was that this would be very difficult for Egyptian public opinion which would see in this only a disguised form of the hated joint defense.

Mr. Byroade said that if Egypt has agreed not to stop orders, would Egypt be content to have copies of the orders sent from the UK to the base?

Nasir said that what the Egyptians want is to run the base with Egyptians as soon as Egyptians are in a position to take over. He hoped that this would be in a short period. Acceptance of this idea by the UK would give the UK the friendship of Egypt and the entire Arab world.

Major Salah Salim said that in the course of the negotiations they had asked whether the UK would be prepared to have Egyptian technicians run the base. The British had replied, "meaning forever ", they could have only British control over British stores so long as British stores remained in the base.

Mr. Byroade said that the British might want to send equipment and supplies to Iran. Egypt might not want this to happen. He asked how Egypt could assure "all of us" that the base would work as before until a defense set-up is ready.

Nasir replied, "What can we do except promise?"

The Secretary said that the Egyptian ideas were obscure on this point. He then read from the Egyptian draft terms of reference for the Base Committee (Embassy's despatch No. 2367 dated May 7, 1953).[2] He assumed that Egypt accepted the warehouse idea, but in the event Iran was invaded the goods would have to move. The stores in the base are not like in the vaults of a bank. The point is movement.

[2] Not printed.

Mr. Byroade inquired whether the Egyptians would have any objection to the British bringing in replacement stores.

Nasir replied that the British were free to maintain the present level of stores in the base, but if there was any increase in this level, the Egyptian Government would wish to be consulted.

Byroade said that it seemed to him that there was sufficient area of agreement to make the problem between Egypt and the UK really one of finding words to express ideas.

The Secretary said he was very happy to have this talk.

Nasir said that he could assure the Secretary that Egypt wanted the base to be ready and workable.

Colonel Meade expressed the opinion that, "It all boils down to where the orders come from" and asked whether Nasir agreed.

Nasir replied that this was one point; the other point dealt with the duration of the presence of British technicians. Egypt must know the time limit "when all British will be gone".

Colonel Meade said that as a military man he disagreed with this idea. He could not see how Egypt could object to British ordnance supervisors. In American bases abroad, Americans are always there. It was hard for him to see how the population could object to these people. Once the British forces had moved, the volatile emotion of the people might disappear.

(Note: Several discursive trends of thought appeared at this point and could not be recorded.)

Asked regarding the status of the British technicians, Salah Salim replied that they could be a team of assistants attached to the British Military Attaché in Cairo. Replying to a question by Colonel Meade, Salim said that Egypt had given full assurance that such a team could go down to visit the base at any time.

Nasir reiterated the point that Egypt did not want any British technicians in the base as soon as possible.

The Secretary asked, "How can we get the talks going again? The situation is dangerous." Nasir replied, "By getting the British to agree to the Egyptian point of view." Salah Salim said that he did not think the British would agree.

Nasir, in reply to a question, made it clear that as he viewed the channel of communication regarding the disposition of supplies in the base, it would run from the British War Office to the British Military Attaché, Cairo, and thence to the Egyptian War Office. He said the orders must not go directly to the base.

The Secretary said that he had found the talk interesting and helpful. He looked forward to seeing the same group at dinner at the Embassy that evening.

Nasir agreed that they would talk that evening and remarked that Egypt is ready to put some teeth in the Arab League Collective Security Pact. He said, "We all want action."

The meeting broke up.

The Ambassador in Egypt (Caffery) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET CAIRO, May 13, 1953—noon.

2421. Personal for Smith from the Secretary. Have found situation in Egypt more serious than Department generally has recognized. Negotiations between UK and Egypt are at present suspended with seemingly little possibility either party assuming initiative in reopening talks. The base negotiations are stymied on technical points but these assume great importance in an atmosphere of mutual distrust.

Our observers here are convinced and I share their view that possibility of open hostilities in near future is real. British representatives here agree. From talks with the Egyptians I believe that while they realize chaos and destruction of their regime would inevitably be an aftermath of open hostilities they will choose that alternative rather than make concessions to the British which they consider would publicly be looked upon as infringing Egyptian sovereignty. Their emotions are so great they would rather go down as martyrs than concede.

Conversation with Stevenson and General Robertson indicate they are under instructions to negotiate solely along bases case A.[1] They recently requested new instructions receiving in reply message from Churchill stating they had their instructions and to stick to them.

In analyzing the technical points of difference we find nothing that could not be solved but for a complete lack of trust and confidence among the parties. It is almost impossible to over-emphasize the intensity of this feeling. It may be pathological but it is a fact there just as sentiment is a fact in London. Attitude here in the short run cannot be changed.

In face of above we have outlined the President's conception of importance of Egypt and the role she can play in the future. Stassen and I have in a general way talked of US assistance to enhance the position of Egypt if present difficulties can be surmounted. Have explained as well reasons why defensive arrangements in Middle East and maintenance of base for immediate use are considered essential from US point of view. I believe these talks held with both Naguib and members of RCC have been effective and believe (but cannot be certain) that they will do nothing drastic until I have had chance return to present my views to the President and JCS.

TOP SECRET CAIRO, May 13, 1953—1 p. m.

2423. Personal for Smith from the Secretary. In discussions with both British and Egyptian officials it became clear that there are a number of points of disagreement on technical matters. Some of these are apparent by comparison of British and Egyptian text already transmitted.[1] It became clear in discussions, however, that major differences were really over following two points:

1. The British position is that British "technicians" (which also covers superintendents, administrators and the like) under direct instruction from London should remain on base as long as British equipment is stored there, i.e., perhaps indefinitely. The Egyptian position is that British personnel should remain only long enough to adequately train Egyptian replacements.
2. The manner of channeling instructions from London to British technicians so long as they remain on the base.

In discussing point 2 above with the British it became obvious that a real point of principle could be involved. The Suez base is at the present time utilized by the British to supply their forces in Cyprus, Libya and Jordan and certain local forces such as the Arab Legion. Question therefore arises as to whether the base in Egyptian hands can continue to be utilized for this area-wide function. The best solution, of course, is for a regional defense organization to provide instructions on such supply matters. In absence of such solution it would seem essential both for us and British that base can continue to serve the area and not be in that respect purely an Egyptian base.

[1] The texts of these documents were transmitted to the Department in despatch 2367 from Cairo, May 7. (641.74/5-753)

When the member of the RCC called upon me this afternoon I put this question bluntly to them. I was surprised to have them give every assurance that they would allow the British complete freedom of action on matter of shipping supplies. They stated that they had already so informed the British and this was a matter of record. I am inclined to doubt this and believe they had only considered the matter fully late last night in view of our pointed questions of yesterday.

Believe British should meet the principle of training Egyptians and if Egyptians will agree in writing on the latter point this should go a long way to solving the present dilemma. We have attempted to meet this point in the US draft.

Another point which we have discussed extensively with the Egyptians and which is beyond the scope of the present British and Egyptian drafts is the question of a regional defense organization. The Egyptians go to great length in assuring us of their future intentions, but state that they cannot accept MEDO. While we cannot be sure of their future intentions, it is obvious that to attempt to impose a preconceived defensive arrangement upon the Egyptians will meet with complete failure. This is apparently a general attitude of the Arab States. Am convinced that past concept of MEDO not feasible under present conditions, but regardless of our views it is obvious that MEDO at present does not have a chance.

I think it well to look back at the reasons why the MEC and MEDO were proposed. In the beginning MEC was an obvious attempt to solve the Suez base problem by substituting international command for British command. This did not work. During the intervening period we have forgotten this initial reason and become enmeshed in the concept itself rather than for its original purpose, i.e., a solution to one specific base problem. While there is no doubt that we should continue to work towards an area defense arrangement, there is no point in attempting to force one of a particular type in the immediate future if it would be politically unacceptable. Furthermore, I believe we can obtain a Suez base agreement by other means if it can be done quickly. The British would not like this as the concept of trading evacuation for MEDO has become a fixation.

Egyptian thinking on defense arrangements for the area centers around building up the Arab States under the Arab League pact. They stress the theme that the US and UK already have treaty arrangements with members of the Arab League which provides the necessary Western tie-in. In addition to this they state they are ready at any time to undertake defense planning with the US and cooperate fully upon any needed infrastructure for the defense of the area as a whole. They state they are willing to contemplate similar plans with the British, but cannot make such fact public at present time. They state they also would have difficulty in agreeing at this time in writing that British could have re-entry right in event of hostilities. We gave them no reason to believe such an arrangement would be satisfactory. They finally devised a formula which specifies that in event of attack upon any Arab State, access and use of the base would not only be given to Arab partners, but to any nation allied with any of them. It is not clear whether they would agree to put this in writing.

Although there is considerable urgency in getting matter here off dead center, have declined to become middleman because of nature my trip and fact that matters raised in this cable are of such fundamental nature as to require Washington decision. Consequently US draft reported separately has not been shown in Cairo to either British or Egyptian officials. I am inclined to believe question can wait my return Washington before need for action on part of US with British and Egyptians. Full report by cable being sent so that you will have opportunity form recommendations for early action after my return and basis for action if, in your opinion, developments after my departure here indicate need for quicker action on our part.

Telegram 248 to Secretary Dulles in Dhahran, May 18, repeated to Cairo, reported concern in the Department of State that military moves by both Egyptians and British would result in an incident which could set off a chain reaction. Telegram 2456 from Cairo, May 19, advised the Department that the likelihood of an immediate "blow-up" had been considerably diminished as a result of the Secretary's visit. Telegram 6235 from London, May 22, reported, however, that the British Foreign Office considered its warning to British subjects to leave Egypt amply justified by events. Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Israel [1]

SECRET TEL AVIV, May 13, 1953—5 p. m.

Subject: Israel

Participants:

United States	Israel
Mr. John Foster Dulles	H. E. Moshe Sharett, Foreign Minister
Mr. Harold E. Stassen
Mr. Francis H. Russell

At meeting May 13, between Secretary Dulles, Mr. Stassen and Foreign Minister Sharett, latter reviewed Israel attitude toward peace with Arabs. Stressed Israel interest in peace, criticized Arab fear of Israel aggression and outlined Israel position regarding territorial adjustments, Arab refugees, compensation, Jerusalem, border incidents, economic boycott and area defense.

After introductory remarks describing peace with the Arab states as cardinal aim Israel foreign policy and characterizing problem as primarily as psychological one of accustoming Arabs to fact of Israel's existence, made following points:

Arab Fear of Israel Aggression:

Sharett claimed Israel fear of eventual convergence Arab states on Israel in attempt destroy her more justified than "Arab pretense of mortal fear of inherently aggressive nature of Zionist enterprise". Argued that Arab position "illogical" in maintaining on one hand Israel must expand because it is too small to contain its population and on other that it must give up territory as condition of peace; that such Arab fears neglect "delicacy international position Israel" which because of lines with world Jewry and economic needs is necessarily more sensitive to international public opinion than Arab world; and that country's "moderate, stable, democratic government" not likely in face world opinion engage "in military adventure with numerically superior foe that is gaining in military strength." Suggested that if Arab fears genuine, should seek protection of peace treaty which though not complete guarantee creates international obligations difficult to violate.

Changes:

Criticized as unreal recent "loose talk" regarding territorial changes to Israel's detriment. Particularly critical Arab efforts resurrect 1947 partition resolution "after refusing accept it and attempting subvert it through war." States Israel prepared make peace only on basis existing territory (accepting armistice lines as permanent boundaries) with possible minor adjustments to straighten frontiers.

Refugees:

Described repatriation Arab refugees as "suicidal". Arguing there was no modern example of mass population dislocation resulting from "war of aggression" followed by return to status quo ante, and citing mass influx Jewish refugees, Sharett claimed repatriation Arab refugees "would present complex economic problem" and from security point of view "would explode Israel from within." Urged economic resettlement in Arab countries as in long run interest both Arab refugees and countries concerned.

Compensation:

Stated Israel accepts liability for compensation but added in apparent reference Israel war damage claims, that he meant compensation "fair to both sides, bearing in mind that Israel came into possession Arab lands as result war". Would prefer lump sum payment into international fund to be used in connection overall plan for refugee settlement "rather than frittered away piecemeal".

Jerusalem:

Denied Arab states had legitimate interest in problem. Saw it as question between Israel and Jordan and Israel and United Nations (latter representing spiritual interests world community). Claimed those interests now served by free access to holy place hold on new cities, but if international community "still uneasy" and desires internationalize holy places Israel would cooperate. In this connection argued transfer Foreign Ministry to Jerusalem has no bearing on problem holy places, and if anything would help protect interests world community by bringing agency of government most sensitive to international feeling into more effective contact with rest of Israeli Government. Stated that while he understood inhibitions foreign missions with regard moving to Jerusalem, Foreign Ministry separated from rest of government as suffering from "pernicious anemia" and if confronted by choice between being separated from diplomatic missions or from government "would inevitably choose former".

Border incidents and economic boycott:

Stating that if peace not possible essential that Arabs discontinue "acts if hostility", Sharett reviewed Israel position on what he called "rising curve frontier incidents degenerating into guerilla warfare", particularly on Jordan border and "intensification economic warfare" particularly Suez boycott. Regarding former, contrasted Lebanese and Syrian enforcement of curbs against infiltration with Jordan laxity and stated "if latter not brought under control, no telling how it will degenerate". Regarding economic boycott cited reported Lebanese warning to KLM to discontinue service to Israel as "violation of obligations under United Nations Charter", and danger to world community's interest in Suez of precedent permitting Egyptians regard Security Council resolution against Suez boycott, particularly if Egypt's position in Canal Zone to be strengthened. Indicated that unless there was early British-Egyptian settlement of canal problem which included elimination of blockade, Israel would again have to raise question in Security Council.

Defense:

Admitted concern with security against Arab attack in absence Arab-Israel peace, but expressed concern regarding Soviet threat to Israel, reaffirmed readiness play full part in area defense, and urged strengthening Israel's defense capacity, regardless reluctance Arab states to commit selves to defend area.

Secretary expressed appreciation Sharett's presentation, remarking that as judge might not agree with all his arguments but as lawyer admired presentation of case. At dinner same evening, in response to query from Sharett regarding areas of disagreement, Secretary replied that there appeared no basic difference in objectives, that United States and Israel seemed envisage same kind of peace, but might be differences in tactics and details, in question like refugees, in matters of timing, in question of responsibilities of various parties, et cetera.

Replying to question from Secretary regarding meaning Soviet peace offensive, Sharett expressed opinion it was tactical maneuvre, that policy began maturing in ruling clique prior Stalin's death, that it is not only designed relax external pressure on internal problems but is attempt encourage widening rifts in democratic camp. Secretary outlined United States policy explaining that curtailment military expenditure did not mean United States thought peril less but was attempt to build for long haul on realistic basis that would enable United States sustain military strength without threat of economic exhaustion.

SECRET TEL AVIV, May 13, 1953.

Subject: Economic Problems of Israel

Present: Mr. Stassen, Mr. Eshkol, Mr. McDaniel, Messrs. Matteson, Kollek, Avriel and Jones.

This meeting consisted largely of observations by Mr. Eshkol, some remarks by Mr. Kollek and several questions and a few final observations by Mr. Stassen.

After a long account of Israel's development program, and a brief account of the internal budgetary situation and of the Government's efforts to attain internal stability, Mr. Eshkol stated that the major problem now facing Israel was that of "debts". It was stated that the present external debt was approximately $387 million dollars, that approximately $100 million matures within one year and that the management of this debt takes an inordinate amount of time of key Ministry of Finance officials.

By way of background Mr. Kollek explained that the present debt situation grew out of Israel's rate of immigration, the Arab Economic Boycott, efforts on the part of the people of Israel to do too much in too short a time and their general inexperience. Mr. Kollek also stated that the effects of peace in the area and in lifting of the Arab Economic Boycott were very difficult to evaluate. He estimated however, that annual savings to Israel in foreign exchange of from $30 to $60 million might eventuate if a regional political settlement were made.

Mr. Stassen expressed a sympathetic interest in Israel's problems. He emphasized that US aid programs were governed by US foreign policy relationships with and by the economic policies of the recipient governments. He went on to say that for budgetary and other reasons the US Government was screening its foreign aid programs carefully this year and consequently was very much interested in the efforts recipient countries were making toward attaining economic stability and self-sufficiency. He concluded by saying that the Secretary and himself would be glad to give considerations to Israel's problems.

SECRET TEL AVIV, May 14, 1953.

Subject: Economic Problems of Israel

Present: The Secretary, Mr. Stassen, Mr. Sharett and Messrs. Eshkol, Bernstein, Horowitz, Kollek, Avriel, Ben Dor, Sherman, MacArthur, Matteson, Russell, McDaniel, Evans, Street and Jones.

The meeting was opened with a brief outline of the economic policies and problems of Israel by Messrs. Eshkol, Bernstein and Horowitz. They all agreed that the most urgent of the problems was that of the external short term debt. Total external indebtedness was said to be approximately $380 million of which approximately $100 million would be maturing within the next 12 months. It was pointed out that a refunding operation, in the magnitude of the next 12 months maturities, would represent only about 1/3 of Israel's total imports at the present time. It was also pointed out that Israel's present short term borrowing was exceedingly expensive and that by refunding the short term debt and by discontinuing this short term borrowing, from $15 to $20 million would be saved annually in procurement. It was asserted that this saving would be enough to pay for the interest and amortization of such a refunding loan. The hope was also expressed that, if the United States were to assist Israel in such a refunding loan, it be done by some means other than through the U.S. Export-Import Bank. It was feared that the use of this agency for refunding purposes might preclude obtaining a further loan from this source at a later date for development purposes.

Mr. Stassen, in speaking on behalf of the Secretary and himself, first stated that the U.S. fiscal year 1954 budget had not yet been passed by Congress and that, consequently, neither the Secretary nor himself was in a position to speak in concrete terms with respect to economic assistance to Israel during the coming year. Mr.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was sent to the Department as enclosure 2 to despatch 1194 from Tel Aviv. The conversation took place at the office of the Foreign Minister.

Stassen then went on to explain that economic assistance provided through the Mutual Security Assistance is coordinated in the closest manner with the Foreign Policy of the United States as formulated by the Secretary of State. He also emphasized that the United States Government now had world wide responsibilities and that its world wide commitments were now being reevaluated in terms of the United States' own economic capabilities. He then said that this Israel request for a refunding loan would be studied in terms of Israel's own program for achieving economic stability here and for using effectively the German reparations goods about to be received. Generally speaking, he said, an approach to the refunding problem by means of refinancing through existing holders of the short term debt would be preferred by the Government of the United States. In that connection, he asked for full details on the composition of the debt and of Israel's future plans with respect to its balance of payments goals and its efforts to achieve greater economic stability.

At this point, Mr. Sharett reviewed briefly the efforts made by himself and by other members of his Government to obtain a refunding loan over the past year. He also expressed the hope that Israel's rumored share of this year's United States economic foreign aid program would not be reduced. Mr. Stassen emphatically stated, in connection with the latter point, that until Congress had acted on the fiscal year 1954 budget, any estimate of Israel's share thereof had no validity whatsoever.

In the course of the discussion, an analogy had been drawn between the proposed Israeli refunding operation and the recent United States Export-Import Bank loan to Brazil for similar purposes. Both the Secretary and Mr. Stassen explained that there were significant differences between the Brazilian operation and the proposed Israeli operation. It was pointed out, first of all, that the Brazilian was made largely because of commitments that had been previously made by the preceeding administration. And secondly, that United States trade with Brazil differed in important respects from that with Israel in that imports from Brazil were relatively large. Both the Secretary and Mr. Stassen went on to say that the present administration would have preferred to have handled the Brazilian problem, as it will prefer to see the Israeli problem handled, by refinancing of the short term debt through the present holders of that debt or to private financial institutions.

Mr. Sharett concluded the meeting by making the following points:

a. In helping Israel the United States would be helping a country that will help itself.

b. The United States could be assured that any funds allocated to Israel would be used for the purposes for which they were intended. There would be no misappropriations or diversions.

c. The United States could also be assured that allocations to Israel would be used on projects and administered in such a manner that they would maximize the possibilities of Israel's eventually obtaining economic independence.

d. Economic assistance to Israel would differ generally from that provided to other countries by the United States. In Israel, it would be used for the development of a new economy. Elsewhere, it would be more generally used, Mr. Sharett asserted, for the purposes of rehabilitating old and badly dislocated economies.

Editorial Note

Telegram 1633 from Tel Aviv, April 22, had asked Department of State guidance on several points, the most important of which was whether the Secretary of State should make any calls in Jerusalem. The Embassy had planned to concentrate most of his activities in Tel Aviv, but suggested the Israeli Prime Minister might feel he could not attend dinner or dicussions in Tel Aviv if it appeared the Secretary was deliberately avoiding any meeting in Jerusalem. The Department of State's answer, in telegram 950, April 25, was that "arrangements for call or other contacts Prime Minister should be made without reference Jerusalem issue as we reserve our position in this instance." Telegram 964 to Tel Aviv, April 29, advised the Embassy that the Secretary had been invited to have lunch with the Prime Minister in Jerusalem, and stated the Embassy could accept that and other appropriate Jerusalem engagements.

A tentative itinerary prepared by the Embassy for the Secretary's visit listed several events in Tel Aviv on the day of his arrival, May 13. The following day's itinerary called for an 8:30 a. m. departure for Jerusalem, where the Secretary was to meet with the Prime Minister in the morning, and have lunch with him at noon. In the afternoon, following a call on the President of Israel, the Secretary was to make a departing statement from the President's home and cross the Mandelbaum Gate for a visit to Jordanian Jerusalem. (Telegram 1694 from Tel Aviv, May 3)

Telegram 1987 from Beirut, May 9, advised the Department of State the Prime Minister of Lebanon had warned the Ambassador that if the Secretary lunched with the Prime Minister of Israel in Jerusalem it would cause consternation in the Arab world, "which would regard it as American recognition that Jerusalem is capital of Israel in defiance of UN resolution." The Ambassador in Lebanon felt "constrained in view seriousness this situation (if true) express strong agreement with Salaam's estimate. Arab world, lifted up and encouraged by what they regard as 'new look' in American NE policy, would be so hurt and emotionally upset by such a move that great opportunity which we now possess would be prejudiced and Secretary placed on defensive during his visit." Telegram 689 from Damascus, May 12, advised the Department that several high-ranking Syrian officials insisted Israel would use Dulles' visit to buttress their claim that Jerusalem was the capital of Israel.

Telegram 954 from Amman, May 11, advised the Department that the Secretary's plans to attend a luncheon in Israeli-held Jerusalem as a guest of Ben Gurion would be viewed as American recognition of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. Telegram 2415 from Cairo, May 12, reported the Secretary was concerned over the effect his meetings in Jerusalem were having on the Arabs. He considered it too late to shift the meetings to Tel Aviv but asked the Embassy in Tel Aviv to advance the time of the events scheduled in Jerusalem so that he could cross the Mandelbaum Gate at about 3 p. m. and spend at least an hour in Arab Jerusalem. Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Israel [1]

TEL AVIV, May 14, 1953—11 a. m.

Subject: Israel

Participants:

United States	Israel
Mr. John Foster Dulles	H. E. David Ben Gurion, Prime Minister
Mr. Harold E. Stassen
Mr. Francis H. Russell

Prime Minister Ben Gurion expressed hope that the Secretary's mission, including objective of winning Arab friendship, would prove success, and commented as follows on Soviet threat, Israel's potential role in Middle East defense, United States role in Middle East and Israel-Arab relations.

Soviet threat: The Prime Minister agreed with Foreign Minister Sharett in meaning Soviet peace offensive, saying no change in fundamental Soviet objective of world domination, and peace overtures merely tactics to divide and weaken free world. Stated war could be avoided through strength and unity free world and stressed need for "spiritual and military preparedness".

[1] This conversation took place in the office of the Prime Minister, in Jerusalem.

Israel's role in Middle East defense: The Prime Minister stated Israel historically, culturally and spiritually part of free world; was only country in area besides Turkey willing and able to fight for freedom and determined defend its democratic way of life regardless prospects of victory. In this connection contrasted "faith and determination" displayed by Israelis in fight for independence with failure Egyptians resist invasion in two world wars. Also claimed Israel only country in area besides Turkey with effective military potential based on scientific intelligence, skilled population, modern industry and well trained army. Recalled that during last war had supplied allied armies and suggested that an independent state with developed military industry could now make greater contribution. Argued that Israel, aside from Egypt was only country linking Mediterranean with Indian Ocean. Suggested in this connection that road from Haifa to Elath important not only to Israel but to free world as substitute for Suez. Deploring lost opportunity last two years urged some kind of arrangement ("form not important") whereby Israel would not fight alone and immediate steps strengthen Israel military and industrial potential.

United States role in Middle East: Argued that in "Arab Middle East" which is product of long history and where despite surface appearances fundamental changes slow, essential United States have constructive long-range policy to match long-range Soviet policy. Asserted that recent revolutions, changes of leadership promised reforms ("which are more difficult implement than inflaming people against Israel") had left areas historical problems of poverty, ignorance, disease rates, etc. untouched and as result Arab regimes continue shaky. Described root of difficulty as mass misery. To destroy present vacuum in Middle East improvement in conditions mass of population needed. Jet planes and arms, he stated, would not do it. (Argued that Arabs "as they are now" will not use arms against USSR but against Israel). What Arab countries need, he urged, was economic development, education, health. Expressed hope United States would play historic role by embarking on long-range program to raise living standards of Arabs and by encouraging "liberal element in Arab countries who understand that problem is poverty and ignorance". Added he knew United States could not dictate to Arabs, that his suggested solution difficult, would take time, require patience and a constant goodwill.

Israel-Arab relations: Stating Arabs still desire "multilate" Israel by returning to 1947 partition resolution, reviewed Israel fight for independence after Arabs refused accept partition, human and monetary cost of fight, Arab exodus "as part of plan evacuate Arab population for all-out fight against Jews". Cited changes in Israel since fighting and asserted "what was done cannot now be undone". Arabs, he felt, have land area 36 times Israel, have water and oil. Hence do not need additional territory (and in apparent reference to Negev) "or additional deserts", which he suggested "are best left to Israel with whom won't remain desert". Claimed that if area problem only between Israel and Arab states would not be serious. But how tension anywhere will end these days difficult foresee. Stated that despite Armistice Agreement hundreds killed on Jordan and Egyptian borders, economic hostilities (such as Suez blockade) continued. Expressed fear area tension not merely local affair, but like Korea Middle East might become ground new international outbreak. Minimum required in interests world peace in cessation all hostile acts—military, political, economic and psychological. Israel, Prime Minister stated, will make contribution resettlement Arab refugees in Arab states, and is prepared for economic, cultural and even military cooperation with Arab states if Secretary finds Arab desire for positive cooperation. If Arabs not prepared for formal peace agreements, hoped United States could be helpful in obtaining cessation hostile acts in area, possibly through extending scope of present armistice agreements.

In reply to Prime Minister, Secretary stated he had come to listen and learn, was familiar with Israel's history and present creative activity, admired both and felt they created feeling of common debt in which was more binding than formal treaty of alliance. Agreeing Soviet peace overtures merely tactic, which could hardly be otherwise in view Soviet ideology and belief that harmony only possible in wholly Communist world, Secretary urged need to be on guard, particularly against danger permitting Soviet tactics divide free world. While United States believes in testing willingness USSR make concessions and is prepared workout accommodation with Soviet Union, does not believe few kind words change Communist doctrine. Citing absence assurances of armistice in Korea, attack on Indochina, indications from disposition Soviet Forces of potential buildup in East Germany, Secretary stressed that situation still dangerous and confronts free world with problem matching Soviets strength without losing essential freedoms. In this connection, underscored that nothing United States is doing should be interpreted as reflecting United States belief Soviet threat less dangerous. United States carrying forward planning started last December prior Stalin's death. Basic objective that planning, Secretary pointed out, misuse of United States productivity to sustain military strength over long period without weakening economy. Decisions taken at NATO were consistent with that objective: In order eliminate possibility economic collapse, costs reduced by concentrating on buildup of quality rather than quantity.

Regarding the Prime Minister's opening remarks, Secretary stated he was impressed with good wishes for success of mission in winning friendship of Arabs and wished to comment frankly. Expressed conviction that without goodwill and confidence of Arabs United States would not be able to play useful role in area. Explained that Arabs feel Roosevelt and Truman administration so subject to Jewish influence that Arab viewpoint ignored. Decisions often taken under pressure United States Jewish groups which felt they had right exercise influence because of contributions to election victory. New administration, Secretary pointed out, was elected by overwhelming vote of American people as whole and neither owes that type of political debt to any segment nor believes in building power by cultivating particular segments of populations.

Called attention to belief President Eisenhower that while United States policy must continue support for Israel as great creative achievement which has evoked sympathy of American people, must also make Arabs realize United States concern for them. States his belief Prime Minister would agree best interests Israel would be served by healthier, friendlier United States-Arab relations. One of major obstacles to improving environment United States-Arab relations, Secretary indicated, was group in United States which feels anything done for Arabs is necessarily contrary Israel interests. Because of activities this group and of pro-Arab group there is strong feeling that United States policy must either be pro-Israel or pro-Arab and cannot be both. Referring to Foreign Minister Sharett's remarks previous day on kind of peace Israel sought, Secretary stated that while there might be disagreement on tactics and details there appear to be no fundamental differences; United States sympathetic and would like to see Israel obtain substantially kind of peace it sought. But suggested would be futile in view fanatical emotionalism of Arabs for United States to support such peace merely as advocate of Israel. Arabs feel that new administration is opportunity improve relations with United States and one of purposes of trip is to indicate United States interest in them. Ability accomplish this purpose may depend on understanding of United States Jews, Secretary stated, and suggested that Prime Minister might be able to help United States to help Israel in this regard.

Summing up United States approach Secretary indicated United States not trying set right all wrongs of world, did not desire interfere where not wanted and where cannot be helpful. But United States had influence, was concerned with peace in world, with conflicts in non-Communist world which could weaken free world in face Communist threat, and would like to see breaches healed. Urging confidence in friendly attitude United States and reaffirming United States sympathy for Israel, Secretary indicated that "if United States efforts to be of assistance in area are considered unfriendly to Israel, if they are misunderstood by United States Jews, if they lead to internal difficulties in United States," then United States "would have to permit events in area to take their course". Prime Minister closed by saying that if Secretary accomplished his mission with Arabs, he (Prime Minister) would see what he could do about problem raised by Secretary.

In conversation with Sharett at dinner previous evening, Secretary expressed hope Foreign Ministry would not be moved while Secretary on trip designed improve climate in area. Sharett said it would not. Secretary added he would, of course, have to reserve United States' position on Jerusalem for some time subsequent.

The Consul General in Jerusalem (Tyler) to the Department of State

RESTRICTED JERUSALEM, May 15, 1953—4 p. m.

157. As far as Consulate General knows administratively all went well visit Secretary and party in Israel-Jerusalem (Tel Aviv has details). Party left on schedule under heavy police escort and those persons along route Consulate General to Mandelbaum Gate clapped as Secretary drove past. Israel security escort stopped Israel side Mandelbaum Gate and party proceeded without stopping past UN observers in no-mans-land to Jordan side. Met there by Undersecretary Foreign Affairs, Governor Jordan-Jerusalem, protocol officer and Chief of Police, AL Arab Legion escort. Proceeded to Consulate General Arab side where party met about 45 notables including heads of Greek Orthodox, Armenian and Roman Catholic Patriarchates and Anglican Bishop, to whom Secretary expressed his pleasure at being in Jerusalem for first time and stated that he had always thought of Jerusalem in a religious and not political sense. Then Aref-El Aref, former Mayor of Jerusalem, fired for making a tactless remark against King Talal, addressed Secretary summarizing usual complaints (Jordan press full of editorials and open letters past few days repeating these), requesting return of refugees and enforcement of 1947 partition and blaming US for continued support Israel, especially policies of President Truman.

Two Arab friends of his at my request, tried to stop him (Secretary replied that while Americans may have differences of opinion at home they do not do so abroad and he would never associate himself with criticism of former President).

Substance of above in Jordan and Israel press this morning. Jordan press noted he spent only 20 minutes in Jordan-Jerusalem and did not stop to see any refugee camps.

Comment: While Aref-El Aref's remarks not in good taste, fact that he felt impelled to make them to Secretary indication of how deeply felt those sentiments are among Palestine Arabs. Latter have expressed their pleasure that they were made and their satisfaction over embarrassment to certain Jordan officials, such as Undersecretary Foreign Affairs, who were there.

Mr. John Foster Dulles	H. E. Fawsi Mulqui, Prime Minister
Mr. Joseph C. Green

The Prime Minister spent most of this time in making a statement. His statement dealt principally with three subjects: Possible peace with Israel, conditions on the border between Jordan and Israel, and the Yarmuk Project. [2]

In regard to a possible peace, the Prime Minister dealt at length with the necessity, as he saw it, for beginning with recognition by both sides of all of the United Nations Resolutions in regard to Palestine from 1947 to date. These Resolutions, he said, were the only foundation for peace. His statement on this matter differed, however, from that made to the Ambassador by the Minister of Foreign Affairs on May 13. The Minister of Foreign Affairs had insisted upon "implementation" of the Resolutions. The Prime Minister spoke of the Resolutions as "the basis for negotiations". It was clear that moderate influences had within the last twenty-four hours, affected his thinking on this subject.

[2] For documentation on the Yarmuk project, see Documents 947 ff.

The Secretary remarked that he did not believe that the United Nations Resolutions of 1947 were a realistic basis for peace at the present time.

The Prime Minister set forth at some length his belief that the settlement of the refugee problem could not be divorced from the political problem of peace with Israel. He insisted that cessions of territory now held by Israel would be necessary in order to make possible a solution of the economic problem presented by the mass of indigent refugees.

The Prime Minister in speaking of the situation on the border, stressed the point that the unwillingness of the Israelis to enter into Local Commanders Agreements and their armed attacks on the Jordanians made in reprisal for infiltration kept the people of Jordan in such a state of agitation as to make difficult the conclusion of any peace with Israel.

The Secretary said that the Israeli Foreign Minister had spoken to him with great concern of the marauding of Jordanian infiltrators in Israel. The Secretary said that he believed that joint measures, such as a joint patrol of the Armistice Lines, would tend to alleviate the conditions of which both sides complained.

The Prime Minister said that at a meeting of the Cabinet yesterday he and all the other members had been astonished and deeply disappointed at a report from the Jordanian Embassy in Washington to the effect that the Department proposed to delay action on the Yarmuk Project until some agreement in regard to riparian rights could be reached with Israel. He denied any Israeli right in Yarmuk waters.

The Secretary said that he was not fully familiar with this matter and suggested that the Prime Minister discuss it with Mr. Stassen.

In his discussion of the Yarmuk Project, the Prime Minister showed his ignorance of Point IV operations in Jordan. He even went so far as to express the idea that Point IV had been very slow in accomplishing anything in the Kingdom.

The American Ambassador endeavored to correct the Prime Minister's false impression in regard to the work already undertaken and accomplished by Point IV.

The Secretary expressed apprehension lest the tension between the British and the Egyptians result in general Arab hostility to Britain and thus complicate the political situation in this part of the world.

The Prime Minister said that as far as Jordan was concerned hostility to Britain was hardly conceivable as the two countries were allied on a basis of mutual interest and understanding.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Jordan [1]

CONFIDENTIAL AMMAN, May 15, 1953—9:30 a. m.

ST D-3/1

Subject: Jordan

Participants:

United States	Jordan
Mr. Harold E. Stassen Mr. Douglas MacArthur Mr. Henry A. Byroade Mr. M. E. Mattison Mr. Andrew G. Lynch Mr. Tracy R. Welling	H. E. Fawzi Mulqi, Prime Minister and Minister of Defense

Mr. Stassen called on the Prime Minister, who also holds the Defense Portfolio, accompanied by Mr. MacArthur, Mr. Byroade, Mr. Mattison, Mr. Welling and Mr. Lynch. Mr. Stassen was welcomed effusively by the Prime Minister who stated rather airily that there were no outstanding political or economic problems in the way of Jordanian-American friendship. He emphasized that his Cabinet was young and dynamic and that five of its members were graduates of the American University in Beirut. He added that Jordan wanted all the economic help it could get from the United States as it was a poor country struggling for its existence. Point IV was useful and much appreciated.

Mr. Stassen then said that it seemed to him there were some very serious political problems which demanded solution before Jordan could be healthy economically. The Prime Minister said that he had pretty well covered the political field with the Secretary in his forty-minute conversation with him. Mr. Stassen replied that he was primarily interested in the economic side. The Prime Minister then emphasized the plight of the refugees and brought in strongly the need for the implementation of the Yarmuk Project. He had heard from several sources, he said, that there were difficulties in the United States in the carrying out of the project. He and his Government felt deeply the necessity for the Yarmuk. Point IV had up to the present been helpful, as had been certain small Wadi projects which the Government had in hand and he mentioned the Zerka irrigation scheme inaugurated by the King on May 13. These, however, were minor projects which had little effect on the general picture. What was required, he said, was a major undertaking that would settle large numbers of the unfortunate refugees and his feeling was that the Yarmuk Project was the answer. He added that immediate financial assistance to Jordan was essential. If it did not come now its effectiveness would be lost as the economy of the whole country was suffering from the presence of the refugees. Economic aid should, in his opinion, benefit the whole community, not a single class such as refugees alone.

Mr. Stassen then pointed out to the Prime Minister that, bad as the plight of the refugees was, there were persons living under Soviet domination whose case was far worse. He felt that this should be realized. It was Mr. Stassen's opinion also that there should be peace in the area at the earliest possible moment. Aid could be more easily given and more profitably used in an atmosphere where peace prevailed.

The Prime Minister took some exception to this view. Throughout the talk he emphasized the importance of keeping economic aid, whether Point IV aid or otherwise, entirely separate from the political situation. There was a tendency, he said, to feel that the United States made economic aid march with political acquiescence. People resented this. The implication was clear—although the reporting officer does not recollect that this statement was made—that if American economic aid was to be made contingent upon peace with Israel, Jordan wanted no part of it.

The Prime Minister then turned to UNRWA. In his view, Mr. Blandford's conception of UNRWA was the wrong one. He knew, he said, that 70% of the money of UNRWA was American money and from his point of view UNRWA was, therefore, an American organization. Its present terms of reference were altogether too limiting. It was not enough to keep the unhappy refugees at a bare subsistence level. Something must be done for them which would give them lands to till and enable them to make decent livings. Again, to him the Yarmuk scheme was a major answer to the problem.

Mr. Byroade interjected a remark to the effect that he felt that there was some misunderstanding on the part of the Prime Minister with regard to the Yarmuk. There was, he said, no idea in the United States of rejecting the scheme but rather a need to examine all aspects of it with great care. Mr. Stassen said that while it could not be said that UNRWA was an American organization, it was correct to say that the Yarmuk was an American project. Mr. Byroade added that the project had not as yet received the complete approval of the United States Government but on the other hand it was entirely wrong to assume that the plan had been rejected. It was necessary, Mr. Byroade said, to consider the plan in relation to the whole area and the economic development of the whole area. The Prime Minister then stated that he could not understand the preoccupation with Israeli interests in the waters of the Yarmuk. The Yarmuk was a river in which two countries had primary interest—Jordan and Syria. It was not an Israeli river. The Jordan River, however, was of interest to both Jordan and Israel and what Israel did to the upper waters of the Jordan was of intense interest to this country. The discussion became somewhat general at this point on the question of the possibility of Israeli diversion of upper Jordan waters causing Lake Tiberius to become a salt sea.

Mr. Stassen then told the Prime Minister of the American philosophy toward economic aid to other countries. He explained that the United States felt it to be in its own best interests to help other countries become economically healthy. We had found, he said, that when our neighboring countries were in economic difficulties there were inevitabily repercussions on the American economy. We firmly believed that by helping other countries we were also doing a good turn to ourselves. He pointed out the difference between this approach to the problem and the Soviet approach. The Soviets went into other countries with the view to taking things away from these countries which would benefit Soviet Russia. The Soviets deprived other countries of a healthy economic existence in order to benefit the Soviet Union. We, too, wished to benefit ourselves but believed that the best way of doing it was by benefiting the other person.

The time period for the interview having come to an end, Mr. Stassen and his group took their leave.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Jordan [1]

CONFIDENTIAL — AMMAN, May 15, 1953—9 a. m.

ST D–3/2

Subject: Jordan

Participants:

United States	Jordan
Mr. Harold E. Stassen	Dr. Hussein Khalidy, Foreign Minister
Mr. Douglas MacArthur
Mr. Henry A. Byroade
Mr. M. E. Mattison
Mr. Andrew G. Lynch
Mr. Tracy R. Welling

After the usual exchange of compliments Mr. Stassen explained to the Foreign Minister that the primary purpose of the Secretary's visit, and his visit was, insofar as possible in the short time at their disposal, to learn of the problems of the countries they were passing through. The Foreign Minister, Dr. Hussein Khalidy, then embarked on a résumé of the political situation as between Jordan, the Arab states and Israel. He went back, with apologies, to 1920 and he explained how over the years the Arabs of Palestine had seen their doom approaching. They had known quite well the fate in store for them and had repeatedly warned the Mandatory power that Jewry was determined to establish a national State in Palestine. Their fears had been repeatedly ridiculed. They had had figures thrown at them which were designed to show that the immigration of Jews into Palestine was more than taken care of by the natural increase in the Arab population. There had been numerous commissions of investigation and innumerable reports, all recommending against the establishment of a State of Israel.

Now we could all see what had happened. He did not wish, he said, to dwell upon things of the past, but some appreciation of what had happened to the Palestinian Arabs was essential to any understanding of the problem today. He emphasized that he was a refugee from what is now Israel. He had lost a home in Jaffa and a home in Jerusalem. When he was in office he lived on his salary. When he was out of office he lived on the charity of his relations. Jordan, the Minister said, wished to be on friendly terms with all neighboring states. Jordan was not a member of the United Nations but Jordan wished to see United Nations a strong organization whose just dictates would be carried out. Jordan was on friendly terms with the United States and Great Britain and had a special relationship to the latter. It intended to recognize its obligations to Great Britain. It was also a member of the Arab League and its interests were becoming increasingly identified with those of the States members of the League.

While Jordan was anxious for peace, there were numerous and real injustices which had been perpetrated upon the Arabs in the past and until steps were taken to right those wrongs he did not see how peace between Israel and the Arabs was possible. He then said that there was no use in discussing the Arab attitude in the past—the fact, for instance, that the Arabs of Palestine had opposed the partition scheme of 1937, or the partition scheme of 1947. They had their reasons at the time. He did not wish to be intransigent nor did his Government, nor to take any stand which would preclude peace. He felt, however, that Jordan must stand with the other States of the League and must demand the implementation of United Nations resolutions on Palestine, with particular reference to the 1947 resolution.

Dr. Khalidy said he thought Mr. Stassen should know the communist situation throughout the country. Jordan was against communism. Jordan put people into jail for being Communists. He, Khalidy, and people like him hated communism. In Israel, on the other hand, you had a strong legally recognized Communist Party.

Arabs of all classes, however, were losing faith in the United States and Great Britain in spite of the ties created by such institutions as the American University of Beirut. Persons spoiling in the refugee camps were receptive to anything which promised change. They had lost all hope and were desperate. These unfortunate people would welcome a devastating war and, according to Dr. Khalidy, would not care if 400,000,000 persons were killed by atom bombs. He stressed the urgency of doing something for the refugees now.

Mr. Stassen thanked Dr. Khalidy for his frank and interesting exposition of his views. He explained again that the Secretary and he were fact-finding and that they planned, upon return to the United States, to weigh carefully all the evidence they had gathered in order to produce an enlightened American policy for this area of the world. The important thing was not to look to the injustices of the past, but to try to find a way to move forward constructively at present.

Mr. Byroade then said that, with permission, he should like to ask the Minister a question. He wished to take advantage of the moment, he said, to find out something which had been on his mind for some time. He then asked Dr. Khalidy as a refugee how he explained the fact that according to his, Bryoade's, information there seemed to be divergent views among the refugees themselves with regard to the solution of the refugee problem. Dr. Khalidy replied that he felt that he could easily answer the question. There were two classes of refugees—the well-to-do landowners and the poor fellahin and townspeople. The former were represented by such persons as his good friend and colleague in medicine, Dr. Tannous, now of Beirut. It was natural, therefore, that there should exist divergent views on the subject.

Conversation then came to an end as the Secretary's visit with the Prime Minister had terminated and the Foreign Minister was awaiting the Secretary's arrival.

Mr. Talcott W. Seelye

After an exchange of greetings, the Foreign Minister asked the Secretary if he wished to ask any questions or make any statement.

The Secretary began with a review of the situation in Egypt in which he expressed his Government's concern for an immediate settlement of the problems existing between Egypt and Great Britain. He stated that the U.S. sympathizes with Egypt's aspirations but feels that Egypt should appreciate the tremendous investment Great Britain has made in its Suez bases and should try to understand the meaning of the loss of these bases to Great Britain. He said that the problem is not just one between Egypt and Great Britain but, since it concerns the vital artery of the Suez, it is a matter of world importance with broad ramifications. Among many factors involved in this issue, he said, is the age-old balance of power.

The Secretary continued by suggesting that, since Jordan maintains such close ties with both Great Britain and Egypt, it might well use its good offices to help effect a reasonable and satisfactory settlement. He said that it was after all to Jordan's interests that a reasonable solution be found, for Jordan must certainly be concerned—as is the U.S.—with stability in the area. Stability, however, could not be assured, stated the Secretary, if Egypt acted in an intransigent manner in the search for a solution.

The Secretary took up the question of relations between Israel and the Arab states. He asserted that Israel was adversely affected by the economic blockade imposed on her by the Arab states, particularly through loss of oil revenues. For this reason he felt it was to Israel's interest to make peace. The Secretary stressed the fact that the U.S. as yet has no ready formula for peace but that he hoped upon his return to the U.S. he would be able to convey to the President some ideas based on his Near Eastern trip. He said that a peace based on the UN Resolutions of 1947 was impractical and impossible of achievement and that he hoped the Arab states would agree to a settlement on more moderate terms. He anticipated that these terms would include, inter alia, some sort of boundary rectification and a determination of the status of Jerusalem.

The Secretary emphasized that he hoped the Foreign Minister would not misconstrue the Secretary's visit with the Israeli Prime Minister in Jerusalem to mean a change in U.S. policy concerning the status of Jerusalem. The U.S. continues to advocate some kind of international status for the city, he said, and his meeting with the Israeli Prime Minister in Israeli-held Jerusalem had no political significance whatsoever. He added that he had again strongly urged the Prime Minister to keep the Israeli Foreign Office in Tel Aviv and not to move it to Jerusalem.

The Secretary went on to state that he was naturally disturbed by the border troubles existing between Israel and Jordan. He mentioned that the Prime Minister had earlier expressed to him his great concern with the border situation and that the day before the Israeli Foreign Minister had done the same. He said he thought concerted measures should be adopted by both sides to eliminate border friction. The Secretary indicated that the establishment of joint roving patrols might possibly be of some help in the matter.

The Secretary then discussed briefly the U.S. position in world affairs, pointing out that prodigious internal expansion had thrust the U.S. into a position of world leadership. He contrasted the U.S. economic policy in Europe with that of the Soviet Union. An example of the difference, he said, is the Soviet Union's technique of draining its satellites of raw materials and making them economically dependent upon the USSR, compared with the U.S. policy of making Europe independent of U.S. economic support. The Secretary said that, although the U.S. has had a policy for such areas as Europe and Latin America, its lack of a policy for the Near East has been conspicuous. He stated that the U.S. Government is now in the process of correcting this situation. After all, he pointed out, the Arab-speaking states have a large population and command an impressive stretch of territory from the Atlantic side of North Africa far eastwards. Thus it behooves the U.S. to adopt a firm and constructive policy with respect to this area.

The Secretary closed by saying that in his earlier talk with the Prime Minister the latter had done all the talking and he the listening. Now he had reversed the process and what he had said to the Foreign Minister was, in a sense, a reply to the Prime Minister. He said he hoped, therefore, that the Foreign Minister would convey to the Prime Minister the essence of what he had said to him.

The Foreign Minister then thanked the Secretary for his remarks and stated that he, for his part, had done his talking to Mr. Stassen. He hoped that Mr. Stassen would convey to the Secretary the substance of his remarks because they were a summary statement of what he would have said to the Secretary had there been time.

Editorial Note

On the morning of May 15, three other meetings were held between members of the Secretary of State's party and officials of the Government of Jordan. At 10 a. m., MacArthur, Byroade, and Lynch called on the Minister of Finance, Suleiman Sukkar, for a discussion of economic and political problems. At 10:05 Stassen, Mattison, and Welling met with the Minister of Economy and Reconstruction, H. E. Anwar Khatib, his Under Secretary, and two other members of his office staff. They discussed Jordan's need for economic and technical aid, and left before 10:30 so that Stassen could join Dulles in a meeting with refugee leaders. At 10:30 MacArthur, Byroade, and Lynch met with the Minister of Education, Ahmad Tuqan. Tuqan had spent eight months as the senior Jordanian representative on the Mixed Armistice Commision, and gave the Americans his views on the Jordanian-Israeli border situation.

Notes on Conference Between the Secretary of State and Delegation of Refugee Leaders, Edited by the Attaché in Jordan (Cassin)[1]

Mr. John Foster Dulles	Delegation of Refugee Leaders
Mr. Harold E. Stassen

Prior to beginning of conference photographs were taken of the Secretary and the American Ambassador.

Refugee Leaders were then introduced to the Secretary by Mr. Vernon Cassin.

Introduction by Mr. Dulles:

"I am very happy to have this opportunity to meet briefly with you gentlemen. The plight of the refugees whom you represent is certainly one of the most tragic problems there is in the world today. The task of finding a solution is a task which should challenge the united intelligence and wisdom and statesmanship of the peoples of the world. I do not come here with any solution of this problem, or of any problem for that matter. I come here as I have repeatedly said to evidence the increasing Christian concern which. . . ."[2]

Interrupted by arrival of Mr. Stassen introduced by Mr. Cassin. . . .

"I repeat that we come here not with a solution of the problem but to show evidence by our presence here of the increased concern which our Government shares in this area of the world and as evidence of the increased determination that our Government has to be helpful in any way that is welcome in attempting to exchange courtesies and develop better spirit of cooperation and goodwill. We are here to listen and to learn, and of the things we want to learn none are more important than the problems of those who represent the tragic element of humanity now known as the Arab refugees. We shall be very pleased to hear whatever your representatives have to say on their behalf."

First representative, Dr. Izzat Tannous:

"Mr. Secretary, we wish to thank you on the behalf of the refugees for coming here and we wish to welcome you to this country. It is indeed heartening to the refugees to see that the Secretary of State of the United States of America should come to this country to see with his own eyes what has taken place in this country and to see the drastic difficulties and plight of the refugees. . ."

Interruption by the Secretary:

"We were able to see as we drove past the refugee camps some of the refugees and the conditions they live in. . ."

Dr. Tannous continues:

"As I say, we have often asked in the United Nations for members to come and see, because when they see things too, they will appreciate the harm that has been done. It just happens that today is the 15th of May—and the 15th of May is the day of our crisis. I do not know whether destiny has made it so that we should meet you on that day. It may be that this very day will open a new era for the improvement and the return of the properties to those refugees and to the people of Palestine who have been deprived of their homes and lands. In the past we considered the date as symbolic of our suffering, and we hope that in the future we shall commemorate it as a day of festivity instead of as a day of mourning. Your Government, as you have said, is now taking more interest in solving this problem. You must have passed the refugees, and noted the conditions in which they are living. You also passed through Israel and you have seen the property and lands in Israel. These lands belong to those people you passed and whom you will be passing as you go along. These people were living happily in their homes, farms and villages. They were well established and happy. Now they are destitute. I hope you have also seen those on the border. They are just on the borderland between the two boundaries. Although they have lost their lands, their houses and huts remain on this side. They are landless and have no means of livelihood. Although they still have their homes, tens of thousands of these people have lost their lands which have been tilled for thousands of years by their families and they are not, therefore, considered as refugees according to the United Nations. The definition of a refugee, according to the United Nations, is a man who has lost his home. Because of this situation the border villagers receive no help and are leading a very bad life.

"These conditions will force the refugees to go contrary to the teachings of democracy. We want to warn you, that although we don't want war, we cannot overlook the fact that you have created a class of people who are so destitute that they are bound to want war. This only emphasizes the necessity of a quick solution. We have to have a solution now, because the problem grows and becomes more bitter. These people are losing hope and unless we do something to assist them and give them hope regarding their determination in the United States, it might be too late to overcome it in the future. This is not the place to go into past history to prove our rights, the rights of these refugees. But things are as they are, and we do have refugees. These people of Palestine have been displaced and none have been replaced. They are replaced by other people. Something must be done. Now we endeavor to arrange for them to return in order that they might assume their normal life. There were resolutions made by the United Nations. The whole situation is the result of the partition and other United Nations resolutions. The 1947 resolution of the partition has divided the country into two and created the refugee problem. Our contention is that no proposed economic solution will settle the matter. It cannot. It requires a political solution. These people, according to the principles of the United Nations resolutions are refugees. We were driven from our lands. The whole country was our land. The refugees must go back to their part of the country, where they have tilled the land for thousands of years. Two hundred thousand would go back to the land if the United Nations resolutions are implemented. With the financial help of the United Nations these people can go back to live their just lives. It will relieve the refugee question. It will relieve the serious refugee problem and will lead to prosperity. Two hundred thousand to three hundred thousand, probably more, will return to that country and will lead a normal life. I think it is right for every refugee to go back to his country. It is our indisputable right. It is found in the Declaration of Our Rights in two United Nations resolutions. These United Nations resolutions were taken at different times for these refugees to go back home—to go back home to their country. . . ."

Mr. Cassin next introduced the second representative, Abdul Rahman Siksek. Mr. Siksek read the following memo:

"The Democracies have been treating the refugee problem during the last five years as if it were an academic problem which could be solved by rehabilitation of the refugees in the Arab countries, and the payment of monies, whether as grants or otherwise, to Arab Governments. The result of these attempts was a total failure. The refugee problem in its essence and as the refugees themselves see it, is a political problem much more so than an economic or humanitarian one.

"In handling this case a very important psychological element, which cannot be uprooted from the hearts and souls of the refugees, has been neglected, namely, love of their country and their obstinate refusal to exchange it for any other.

"The Democracies in adopting this wrong course in the treatment of this case thought that time will have its effect on the refugees in reducing their love to their countries and in accepting to be settled in the other Arab countries. It is high time for the Democracies in general and the United States of America in particular, being responsible for directing the policy of the Democracies at present, to realize that the unshakable determination of the refugees is to refuse any such solution and to insist on their natural and inalienable right of return to their homes and the homes of their fathers and forefathers.

"It is necessary that it should be made clear that any amount of money, no matter how large, which would be spent along that wrong line of treatment, would not lead to the solution of the problem, nor would it stem the tide of communism which is about to sweep the Near East.

"The national spirit and feelings among the Arab peoples after the calamity of Palestine, have reached a degree which ought to make the Democracies realize that their interests cannot be secured in the Arab world by a friendly Government if the people themselves are hostile. The Arab peoples will remain hostile to the Democracies until and unless the Palestine problem has been justly settled in accordance with the demands mentioned in the memorandum which I now submit."

Mr. Cassin introduced the third representative, Mr. Kamal Araqat:

"I read a brief message from the Jericho District refugees and say that eighty thousand refugees were waiting for you to come by and see you but they would not let us see you. This message is brief. The first thing we want is justice. We want these people to go back to their homes. We want the orders of the United Nations to be executed according to the following provisions: (1) No settlement will be made in the Middle East without repatriation of refugees. (2) Palestine Arabs aspire for justice from Mr. Eisenhower and you, Mr. Dulles. We were not conquered by war, we were deprived of our rights and we are asking for justice, and justice is all we ask for."

Mr. Cassin thanked the Delegation. After formalities the Delegation dispersed.

The Ambassador in Jordan (Green) to the Department of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL AMMAN, May 16, 1953—8:16 p. m.

973. Secretary and party entered Jordan-held Jerusalem 2 p. m. May 14 and departed Amman airport 12 noon May 15.

Drive from Jerusalem to Amman gave Secretary and party opportunity to see something of country, including refugee camps.

Secretary and Mr. Stassen saw and talked with King, Prime Minister, Foreign Minister, and practically all leading officials of country both at small dinner and reception given by Ambassador May 14 and during calls paid following day.

Secretary received small group representative refugees May 15 who expressed their views orally and left memoranda with Secretary. In conversation of Secretary and Mr. Stassen with Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, both these officials indicated that UN resolutions, more particularly 1947 resolution, must be starting point for peace discussions with Israel. They were not adamant that UN resolutions be implemented before any negotiations could begin which was line taken with me by Foreign Minister in conversation May 13 (Embtel 962). [2] It was apparent that some not much but some softenings in their attitude had taken place subsequent my earlier conversation.

In all conversations Jordan officials emphasized plight of refugees and importance of carrying out Yarmuk projects.

Local press reaction adverse but Secretary greeted with some applause, both in Jericho and Amman while travelling by automobile. This manifestation unusual and indicative of hope placed in visit of Secretary to Jordan.

Security measures for trip Jerusalem-Amman involving use of some 10 armored cars and 1500 troops carried out without hitch. Adequate protective measures for Secretary and party were taken throughout visit.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Syria

SECRET DAMASCUS, May 15, 1951—evening.

Subject: Syria

Participants:

United States	Syria
The Secretary	General Shishakli
Mr. Stassen
Mr. Byroade

The principal points covered in a small evening meeting May 15, 1953 between Shishakli and the Secretary, in which Messrs. Stassen and Byroade also were present, were as follows:

General Shishakli presented to the Secretary in a brief manner the familiar representation of the changing feeling about the Arab world for the United States and the reasons therefor. He traced the earlier feeling of friendship for the United States back through their desire to see the United States become the mandatory power rather than France or Britain in the Arab area. The theme ended with the statement that feeling of confidence among Arab peoples for the United States was now nearly lost because of our past support for Israel.

At the end of the above speech, Shishakli specifically made the point that the United States should not attempt to "impose" a settlement. While he wished for energetic action on the part of the United States, he did not want it to be without prior consultation and agreement with Arab leaders.

The Secretary outlined the general purpose of his trip, the philosophy of the new Eisenhower Administration which included a comparison of the United States and Soviet policies including those in the economic field.

Referring to a remark the Secretary had made about imperialism Shishakli stated his concern at what might be the motive of the Turkish Government in creating troubles along his northern frontier. The Secretary told Shishakli we would check into this when we arrive in Turkey.

In commenting upon the Secretary's remarks about the overriding danger of Soviet Russia, Shishakli developed the theme that the communist menace and the menace of Israel both tied together in the end. His line of logic was that since Syria has to devote about fifty percent of its budget to military expenditures because of Israel, it was not in a position to improve living conditions of the people which were necessary to fight communism from within. He asked in this regard that the United States help Syria with grant military equipment to ease the burden. He promised that Syria would never attack Israel.

Shishakli also made the point that the United States should not deal with Syria through the French. The Secretary informed Shishakli he should have no reason for concern on this point.

The Secretary asked Shishakli whether he thought it wise to move for a total peace settlement in the area at this time. Shishakli replied that this was impossible, that there would have to be a series of steps taken to reduce tension before Arab leaders could contemplate a peace settlement. In response to a query from the Secretary as to the nature of these steps, Shishakli replied that they should be along the lines of the United Nations resolution.

The discussion broke up with the Secretary complimenting Shishakli upon the manner in which he had been able to keep conditions along his border with Israel fairly quiet.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Syria

SECRET   DAMASCUS, May 16, 1953.

ST D-4/1

Subject: Syria

Participants: Secretary Dulles, Mr. Stassen, Ambassador Moose, Mr. Byroade, Mr. MacArthur, and other members of the U.S. Embassy and delegation; and General Shishakli, the Foreign Minister, the Syrian Ambassador to Washington

After the ususal amenities, General Shishakli said that he would like to review certain important problems affecting Syrian policy. The exposition which he would make would not differ much from what he had in the past told Ambassador (then Minister) Cannon, Ambassador Moose, and Mr. Byroade when the latter visited Damascus last year. He said that he had asked the Foreign Minister and the Syrian Ambassador to Washington to be present so that they could hear the discussion and thus be in a position in their further discussions to act in accordance therewith. General Shishakli said that he was a military man and did not talk like a politician. He would speak frankly. He began by saying that as a result of U.S. elections last November there was great hope in Syria and the Arab world that there would be a new U.S. policy with respect to the Near East. In the past there had been a feeling of friendship and good will between the Arab people and the United States. The Arab world in general and Syria in particular liked the United States because of the democratic ideas and principles for which it stood and which had first been made clear to the world by President Wilson. During World War I the Arab world had joined the side of the Allies and revolted against the Ottoman Empire in order to gain freedom and independence. Unfortunately, following World War I the United States retired from the world scene and left the other Allies to do what they wished with the Arab world. The result of the Arabs' assisting the Allies in World War I was that they were divided up into mandates. The mandate system, instead of raising living standards in the Arab world thus making for greater Arab strength in fact, was used to exploit the resources of the Arabs and to keep them weak and divided. In World War II the Arab world also tried to help the Allies but after this war terminated the situation remained the same as before despite Arab assistance. It was only when the Syrians finally revolted in 1945 that they gained their independence. Furthermore, instead of recognizing the legitimate aspirations of the Arab world the Western Allies assisted in the introduction of "outsiders" who had driven the Arabs from their own lands in Palestine. General Shishakli said that he blamed not only the United States and Western powers for the above situation, but also the Arab world itself.

He then said that relations between different peoples can only be built on trust and good will. The Arabs cannot do this alone. They must have the help of the United States in establishing trust and confidence. General Shishakli said that he is a realist. He sees facts as they are. He is not one of those Arabs who says that Israel does not exist. On the contrary, he recognizes that the state of Israel is a real and living thing. He does not want arms to push Israel into the sea. He wants and hopes very much that the United States will treat Arabs and Israel alike.

The United States and Syria both know the danger of Communism. Syria is spending one-half of its budget on defense instead of spending a large portion of this amount to raise living standards and thus to increase the internal defense against Communism. Syria is determined to maintain its independence. Like the United States, it will defend itself against Communism. The United States has the capability of giving economic and military assistance to Syria in order for it to remain independent. General Shishakli said that he trusted the United States as do other Syrian leaders. But these Syrian leaders must also have the trust and confidence of the Arab peoples. Syria bases its policy with respect to Israel on the United Nations decisons, one of which recognizes the existence of the state of Israel. If Israel is unwilling to recognize the other United Nations decisions it has in fact no legal basis for existence. Israel needs help to live and if she is given such help it should be specifically conditioned by Israeli observance of UN decisions relating to (1) refugees, (2) partition of Palestine, (3) the internationalization of Jerusalem. Regarding refugees, many of them will not return to Israel and accept Israeli domination. Only a relatively few will actually wish to return. For those who remain in the other Arab states aid is needed to settle them. Regarding the partition of Palestine, Syria will not accept the "fait accompli" of further Arab territory acquired by Israel after the armistice. Regarding the internationalization of Jerusalem, Syria cannot speak for Jordan, but General Shishakli said he did not believe that Jordan would refuse such internationalization. General Shishakli concluded his presentation by saying that he understood Secretary Dulles had not come to Damascus to make any decisions or reach any definitive conclusions and he had therefore limited himself to giving a friendly and frank exposé of the main problems which preoccupy Syria.

Secretary Dulles then said that the purpose of the trip was, as General Shishakli had pointed out, not to negotiate or reach definitive conclusions but to understand better the views of the Arab world and through personal contact establish that feeling of confidence which is essential if wise decisions are to be made. Furthermore, if the Arabs believe that we are interested only in Israel and are interested in a further expansion of Israel it is difficult to proceed ahead with the solution of various problems because of the distrust that would poison the general atmosphere. (General Shishakli said he believed the United States people's views had in the past been poisoned by Zionist propaganda. They believe now that a new era was about to dawn as a result of the United States elections.) Secretary Dulles said that he hoped the new United States administration will justify the confidence which General Shishakli expressed and will act in a way to inspire further confidence. He did not wish to discuss whether or not there had been mistakes in the past. It was the future to which we must turn our full attention. He said that the state of Israel does exist. The problem is to find a way to make Israel's existence compatible with peace and harmonious relations in the Near East area. Thus far Secretary Dulles and Mr. Stassen had visited three Arab countries which are neighbors of Israel. He had the impression that in each of these countries there is fear that Israel and particularly extremist elements therein wish to expand the present Israeli frontiers and that Israel will be aided by the United States in such an expanison at the expense of the Arab neighbors. Secretary Dulles said he wished to give the strongest and most categorical assurance that the United States is opposed to any expansion of the existing Israeli frontiers. The United States Government would be glad to discuss with the Syrian leaders the concrete steps that might be taken to get across the idea that the United States does not favor Israel at the expense of Syria or the other Arab states.

Regarding the military assistance which General Shishakli had indicated was required, the United States must be certain that any military aid is not to be used aggressively by one state against its neighbors. The purpose of military aid is to assist countries which feel threatened to defend themselves from aggression. This means that one element related to United States military assistance is that the United States be confident that Syria would not attack Israel and at the same time to give greater confidence to Syria that Israel will not attack it. We would like to see a steady improvement of relations of all the countries of the Near East. We also hope and expect that if greater aid for the Arab countries is possible that it would eventually involve some form of regional security pact. Also, the precise details of such a pact may not as yet be clearly defined.

Secretary Dulles said that from the viewpoint of Syria the first problem in their minds is the question of Israel, whereas from our viewpoint the United States must look at the balance of power between the Soviet and non-Soviet world. Secretary Dulles expressed the hope that on the basis of the present exchange of views it might be possible to work out a program which would serve both the interests of the United States and Syria. He said that Syria is fortunate indeed to have only Israel as its main problem. Israel is the only problem which Syria has because United States power acts as a restraining force against the aggressive intentions of the Soviet Union. He expressed the hope that Syria would have a sympathetic appreciation of the position of the United States and he could assure General Shishakli that the United States had a sympathetic appreciation of Syria's problems. Secretary Dulles said that when he talked about the broader concept of a regional defense system he was not sure that the details suggested in the MEDO concept were the best way to bring this about. There might have to be changes in the details of this concept. He hoped that General Shishakli would consider how a Near Eastern collective defense system might be worked out and he would be very much interested in any alternate solutions which the General might propose.

General Shishakli said that he could not give any alternate proposals at this time. As the result of its own efforts, Syria no longer feared aggression. Syria had organized its army with no aid from the United States and very little from the United Kingdom with the exception of twelve jet planes which had recently been delivered. He said that further immigration into Israel would not help peace in the Near East. Furthermore, Israel gets great assistance from outside the area. In attacking the problem of regional defense it is first essential to assure security within the Near East area before trying to set up a defense system against attack from without. The Near Eastern people themselves will be the best defenders of their own territory. Before any regional defense setup can be established the Arab people must discuss this problem. Thus far the Western powers have only seriously discussed regional defense with Egypt.

Secretary Dulles said that he was discussing it now with General Shishakli. He said we are impressed with the role that Syria might play at this particular time, particularly in view of the difficulties between Egypt and the United Kingdom.

General Shishakli said that he appreciated the confidence in Syria expressed by Mr. Dulles, but believes strongly that the entire over-all problem must be settled at the same time. If efforts are made to set up a Near East defense organization without prior settlement of the Israeli and Suez Canal questions, for example, the Arab people would not understand and would consider that their leaders had betrayed them. Secretary Dulles said that he was not proposing at this time any specific solutions. If Syria at a time of its own choosing feels that progress can be made in any of the problems which have been discussed, the United States is most sympathetically disposed. In many problems a series of steps are sometimes required prior to an over-all settlement. In other words, it is not always possible to settle everything at once, particularly when problems are very complicated. Among the problems which must be attacked are those of stabilizing the present Israel-Arab frontiers, possibly with minor rectifications; of gradually absorbing refugees; of providing assurance against further Israeli expansion; of building greater military strength in the Arab world; and of making economic progress which will improve living standards of the people. Secretary Dulles said we can perhaps make progress on some of these specific problems without an immediate over-all solution for everything. The formal establishment of peace in the area and a collective defense system may be a matter which can only come about gradually. This does not, however, exclude specific steps toward these objectives. For example, in Israel and Jordan he had found concern over the present inflamed situation along the frontiers. He had tried to suggest ways to the Israelis and Jordanians to improve this situation along the borders. He hoped that progress would be made in this matter and in the other matters mentioned above without awaiting for a final over-all settlement. If there is anything connected with any particular of any of the problems which he had mentioned above which the Syrian leaders believe can be discussed in the coming weeks, the United States would be glad to do so.

Secretary Dulles said he still had to visit a number of other countries prior to his return to Washington. He would then have to report his conclusions to President Eisenhower and the National Security Council so that they could be brought into harmony with over-all United States policy. If at that time General Shishakli thought well of the idea further discussions could be carried on along normal diplomatic channels. He wished to assure General Shishakli that we had great confidence in Syria. He had talked to the leaders of Israel, Egypt and Jordan in much the same terms with which he expressed himself today. Particularly he had stressed the need for the countries of the region working together. For example, there are various projects under way to utilize the water of the northern districts for the purpose of land reclamation. Coordinated over-all planning is necessary in this question. He would like further to assure General Shishakli that if at any time the latter wished to discuss broader projects, the United States would be very glad to have his views. We believe, however, that there may be specific projects where progress can be made in the near future.

General Shishakli said he believed that he and Secretary Dulles saw things much in the same light. It was his understanding that the United States will prevent further Israeli expansion and force Israel to comply with the decisions of the United Nations.

Secretary Dulles said that General Shishakli had not correctly understood what he had tried to say and that he had not committed the United States to enforce upon Israel the UN resolutions relating to Palestine. The idea he meant to convey was that the United States would be glad to discuss with both Israel and the Arab states ways to assure against further expansion of the Israeli frontier beyond its present limits.

General Shishakli said that the United States had been a power and influence to prevent further expansion and influence Israel to comply with the UN resolutions. Regarding military assistance to Syria, General Shishakli could assure Mr. Dulles that Syria was not and would not be an enemy of the United States. It was essential to get new arms quickly, since it would take time for the Syrian army to be trained in their use. If the Syrian army could be built up the United States could rely on it instead of having to think about the possibility of bringing United States forces into the area in the event of hostilities.

Regarding economic assistance, General Shishakli said that Syria needed aid and felt that some of the money spent in Europe should be diverted to the Arab states. Economic aid was essential to raise living standards and thus defend against internal Communism.

Mr. Dulles said he would like Governor Stassen to comment on military and economic aid, since he had primary responsibility in these fields.

Governor Stassen said that he had been much encouraged by General Shishakli's grasp and understanding of the relationship between economic aid and security. A sound economic foundation is essential for adequate defense. If a satisfactory over-all program can be worked out the United States would give it most sympathetic consideration. The over-all program might envisage water development and land reclamation as a means of economic improvement and also a means of assisting in the solution of the refugee problem. In giving assistance the United States as a matter of principle must be sure that there are sound economic and financial internal policies in the countries which it assists. The Mutual Security assistance program is, of course, dependent upon Congressional action. Mr. Stassen said that the United States administration had asked for a more extensive program in the Near East than in the past. The Congress will probably act on this matter in about two months' time. When Congressional action has occurred, we will then be in a position to talk in specific terms to the Syrians as to the related aspects of a satisfactory over-all program. Mr. Stassen concluded by again expressing his appreciation for the clarity of General Shishakli's briefing and said that it would be of great help in arriving at wise decisions.

General Shishakli said that Syria had a number of economic projects in mind, including those relating to irrigation, roads and industrial expansion. Point IV he said is only a planning organization and has not been able to make satisfactory plans. Syria has undertaken surveys at its own expense. What is needed is financial assistance. There had been some discussion of loans from the International Bank, the Export-Import Bank, and from private sources. But when aid of the kind he needs is available projects can be more seriously studied and undertaken.

Mr. Stassen said that he wished to add a further comment. There is a close relationship between United States aid and the purposes for which it is used. In other words, in extending aid there are engagements that both sides take with respect as to how this aid will be applied. Furthermore, with respect to planning, it is essential that there be sound engineering studies and plans as a basis for any program. When an over-all conclusion has been reached with respect to a program it will be possible to examine the details of how it can be worked out. In the military sphere this would mean what kind of equipment could be provided, how the training would be organized, etc.

General Shishakli said that it would not be wise to get involved in a "vicious circle" where Syria cannot receive United States aid until it gives a specific undertaking or engagement, while on the other hand Syria cannot give an undertaking or engagement until it is assured of a program which meets its requirements.

Mr. Stassen said he believed this could be made by a step-by-step approach to the problem. General Shishakli said that the problem was really to find a point in the circle from which to start. Thereafter mutual confidence and cooperation would increase in a rising spiral. He could assure Mr. Dulles and Mr. Stassen that there was good will on the Syrian side.

The meeting concluded with the usual amenities and expressions of appreciation.

CONFIDENTIAL BEIRUT, May 16, 1953.

Subject: Lebanon

Participants:

United States	Lebanon
The Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State	His Excellency Camile Chamoun, President of the Republic of Lebanon
The Honorable Harold Stassen, Director, Mutual Security Administration
The Honorable Harold B. Minor, Ambassador to Lebanon

After the usual exchange of greetings, President Chamoun said he desired to make a statement. He declared that we are now at a crossroad in relations between the West and the Arab East. He feared that if no positive results are obtained from the Secretary's visit, the area will fall apart. It reveals elements of dangerous weakness. He assured the Secretary there is no hatred or deep-rooted hostility toward the United States in the Arab world, but rather a feeling of bitter disappointment as a result of Palestine. The United States appears to be another big power dominated by politicians anxious to serve local needs. The situation, he declared, has elements which make it easy to improve.

President Chamoun, in speaking of the British, said that British friends in the Near East are becoming increasingly few, especially since the events in Cairo and Churchill's speech. The only answer in Egypt, he said, is complete evacuation of the British. This, he said, is agreed upon by both sides and the questions remain only of the technicians to remain, care of the base, and return in case of a threat of war. The United States, the President said, should find a solution and impose it on both sides. To make this palatable to the Egyptians, the United States should give military and economic aid to Egypt.

Replying to this phase of the President's statement Mr. Dulles declared that the question for us is one of keeping the base ready in case of war or threat of war. If the British leave Suez, there will be vast losses and the base will quickly deteriorate. It is probable that sixty to ninety days would be required to make it ready again. Thus the base's use as a deterrent against Soviet Russia would be lost. The Secretary elaborated the thesis of the great responsibility of the United States in the world today in being the principal barrier against Soviet aggression. To fulfill this responsibility, the United States has created deterrents to Soviet aggression. Suez is one of these important bases and we cannot afford to see it put out of order for a critical period. Mr. Dulles said that our military authorities believe Egypt cannot adequately maintain the base. We cannot look with equanimity on such a situation. The Secretary declared that Egypt should be satisfied with the overwhelming triumph she would have on seeing the British withdraw. He asked why the Arabs did not come forward with a genuine security pact tied to the West which would create an arrangement making possible protection of the base by a group of powers without the onus of infringement of sovereignty.

President Chamoun expressed himself as entirely in accord with the idea of a defense pact. The first step, however, is to find a solution for the Suez problem which would make it possible to set up such a pact and escape from the present vicious circle.

Secretary Dulles told the President that he is actively considering the problem and will continue to do so when he returns. The problem is technical and military and will require some time. He said he had begged Naguib to understand this and not get impatient.

President Chamoun agreed and said he would use his influence with Naguib and others to be patient. He declared, however, that the situation is urgent since shooting may start in Egypt and this will have an effect on the whole area. Returning to the theme of the British, President Chamoun said that not even Iraq would dare renew a treaty with the British. The British, he added, must realize that times have changed and this is not the Victorian period.

Secretary Dulles agreed that times have changed, but in more ways than one. No nation exercises total independence. While Egypt demands there be no foreign troops on Egyptian soil, we have troops in England because the British realize we are dependent upon each other. The Secretary said that if Egypt is unwilling to cooperate for the defense of the free world, she probably will not have her independence for long. This type of nationalism is as dead as imperialism.

Turning to the question of Palestine, President Chamoun said that while Egypt is almost entirely interested in Egypt, Palestine is the more important question here and in the Arab world. There can be, he said, no true Arab cooperation from the heart as long as the Palestine and refugee problems remain unsolved. He referred to the three U.N. resolutions and said that while he does not know the United States attitude on these resolutions, he believes that they must be enforced if there is to be peace. He declared that it is not necessary to live up to them 100%—possibly 60% would be acceptable to the Arabs. In his opinion, United States support of these resolutions would have a profound, favorable effect on friendly relations with the United States. The Arab refugees must go back to their properties or receive other property in compensation. The President then said that if cooperation with the West becomes possible, the United States should give economic and military aid to the Arab world, recognizing that defense of the Near East is a matter for the Arabs.

Secretary Dulles said the United States is sympathetic toward military aid to countries which need it and will make the proper use of it. The demands against the United States in this respect are enormous. All nations want help, our budget is unbalanced, and material is short.

He said we have abandoned the concept of the year of greatest peril, that is, building up to peak effort with the idea that some particular year will be the critical one. The Eisenhower theory is that one can't determine the year of greatest peril and that our military effort must therefore be constant and long range. One of the greatest dangers is that overemphasis will wreck the economies of the free world. That would, in fact, be the year of greatest danger. Therefore, we must be careful of our military resources and are not seeking to give them away. We are anxious to see the creation of adequate security arrangements in the Near East but have rather given up the idea of MEDO as previously conceived. A defense arrangement here needs a hard core of Arab strength and Arab willingness to join the free world in defense against communism. The Arab League, he said, seems to have been an organization without serious purpose, confined to passing resolutions and denouncing. If it could turn into something real for the purpose of composing differences, we would be happy. President Chamoun said that the interests of the West are very great in this part of the world and therefore the United States should help in every way possible to bring strength and stability here. It should be possible, he said, to devise a scheme of defense agreeable to the Arabs and to the Western world.

Secretary Dulles reiterated our desire to give help and bring stability. He declared, however, that we must express real concern when we hear Arabs say there is no communist threat, merely the threat of Israel and the imperialist powers.

President Chamoun said that while this view may be expressed by some persons, it is certainly not the general case. People here are well aware of the communist danger and are willing to play their part if the immediate pressing problems of Egypt and Palestine can be solved.

As the meeting broke up, Mr. Stassen urged upon President Chamoun the need for endeavoring to understand our situation and to use moderation and patience. President Chamoun replied that this was indeed his policy and that he had been somewhat successful at this in his conversations and visits in the Arab world.

CONFIDENTIAL BEIRUT, May 16, 1953.

ST D–5/1

Participants: H. E. Saeb Bey Salaam, Prime Minister of Lebanon
Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State
Honorable Harold E. Stassen, Mutual Security Director

Honorable Harold B. Minor, American Ambassador
Honorable Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary of State
Honorable Douglas MacArthur II, State Department Counselor

Reporter: Armin H. Meyer, Second Secretary of Embassy

Prime Minister Salaam prefaced his remarks by stating that he wished to speak informally and frankly as one who is a true friend of the United States. He was speaking, moreover, not only as Prime Minister but as a private Lebanese and Arab citizen.

1. Grave Situation in the Near East. According to the Prime Minister, the United States formerly held a position of esteem and friendship in the Near East. The faith which the Arabs had in America has, however, been lost and it must be regained. He said he knew the Secretary is determined to restore the Arabs' faith in the United States and hoped the way would be found to do it. There are three key problems facing Lebanon, the Prime Minister said. The first is misery. Behind the show window which the Secretary probably saw there is widespread poverty, he said. The second problem is the Arabs' genuine fear of Israel. Communism is the third. In discussing the latter, the Prime Minister stated that the present extent of Communism in Lebanon was a new discovery even for him, its roots being deeper than he had imagined. He recalled how he was known as the arch enemy of Communism when he served as Minister of Interior in 1946; since his recent ascension to the Premiership he has found the Communist situation not only worse but growing actively. He pointed to the demonstrations today in connection with the Secretary's visit as one aspect. He also cited as Communist-dominated the teachers' strike, which he had through redoubled efforts settled before it could be connected with the Secretary's visit. The Prime Minister said he hoped the Secretary would realize the gravity of the situation and he added the belief that reports from United States representatives in the field are not always listened to by the State Department. He asked the Secretary kindly to do his best to help ameliorate the situation, particularly with respect to the following problems: Egypt, Palestine and the refugees, and North Africa.

2. Gravity of Situation Reason for Visit. To the Prime Minister's remarks, the Secretary responded that the fact that he, Mr. Stassen, and their colleagues were in Lebanon showed that the gravity of the situation in the Near East is recognized by the United States Government. President Eisenhower himself had asked them to undertake this journey, even though they had many pressing matters in Washington. Asserting that the new administration in Washington is prepared to review its policies, the Secretary assured the Prime Minister that the United States' desire to do something about the serious situation in the Near East could be taken for granted. Knowing just what to do was, however, a more difficult problem.

3. Egypt. Discussing the Eygptian question, the Secretary stated he had in Cairo done what he could do to facilitate a solution. As a result of his efforts, as a minimum, time had been gained and assurances obtained from both sides to avoid hostilities.

4. U. S. Relations with France and Britain. The Secretary said that as the Prime Minister must realize, the problems of Egypt and North Africa were extremely difficult for the United States. As he had told the Foreign Minister, the United States has not forgotten that it was once a colony and that it fought for its independence. The United States, he affirmed, has not lost its faith in freedom. He cited the American record in Cuba and the Philippines and added that still today American influence is being exercised in freedom's cause. He cited specifically his recent extremely frank talks in Paris. This is all done quietly, he said, as a family dispute. If the Prime Minister knew all the things that went on, the Secretary said, he would realize the United States is exercising its great influence for what the United States stands. He cited the present flare-up between members of the British Parliament and the American Congress as another reflection of differences of views between the United States and her allies. He declared, however, that those in responsibility in foreign countries, such as Prime Minister Salaam, must realize that the things which the United States is trying to achieve may be lost for centuries if there are divisions in the elements of the free world which have power. He referred to Stalin's "last will and testament", a Stalin writing of last October, wherein the Soviet dictator asserted if would not be necessary for the Communist world to fight the West, that given sufficient dissension they would kill themselves off. Prime Minister Salaam agreed that this was precisely what the Soviets are after, and he denied that Near Easterners expected the United States to break with Britain and France. The Secretary said he did not ask the Prime Minister to conclude that the United States' course of action was the right one but he did feel there is room for honest belief that tries to work these issues out gradually without an open breach. Noting that it is not easy to find the right course, the Secretary said he felt the new Washington administration was entitled to some faith that it is trying to do the right thing.

5. Colonialism. Returning to the problem of colonialism, the Secretary pointed out that the United States Government is exerting strong influence in favor of colonial and dependent people. He recalled his efforts with the French with regard to Indo-China. In Egypt, too, the United States is trying to find some formula. Here he recalled how he was compelled to issue a statement to offset the remarks of Prime Minister Churchill. According to the Secretary, it would be very easy to work out a solution in Egypt if one side trusted the other. He and Naguib had agreed on a statement of principles, but details cause breakdowns because of a lack of mutual confidence. The exercise of this type of influence by the United States, he said, cannot be heralded from a street corner; one must keep a veil on it.

6. Palestine Problem. The Israel issue, the Secretary said, presents a number of difficult problems—not solvable at once or quickly. The presence in the Near East of this high-level mission was in itself a good sign, the Secretary stated. Furthermore, the administration has asked for increased aid to this area, both for Israel and the Arab states. This is something concrete and a break with the past. Other problems, the Secretary said, were of lesser importance. One of these is the border frictions between Israel and Jordan, an issue in which some forward steps were taken during the Secretary's visits to those countries. The Secretary said in Israel he had spoken quite frankly to Prime Minister Ben Gurion and Foreign Minister Sharrett, informing them that United States' policy is determined to restore the confidence of the Arab states. He said he had stated frankly that the United States would not carry out a policy partial to Israel and that the United States would not indefinitely finance Israel immigration. This latter policy, according to the Secretary, is already having a stablizing effect for Israel's immigration has tapered off to where it is almost as low as Israel's emigration. On the issue of the Arabs' fearing Israeli expansion, the Secretary indicated that the United States Government is prepared to consider measures and concert action to prevent aggression by Israel. With regard to Jerusalem, the Secretary thought some formula might be devised not wholly excluding the political authority of Israel and Jordan but establishing some sort of international control there. The refugee problem, he said, also needs solution but this is not readily achievable. Some observers, he noted, argue that Israel should invite the refugees to come back and they won't come. In the Secretary's view this may be true but it still does not solve the problem. Power and water projects in Jordan, he thought, would assist in solving the refugee problem as would pasturage in Syria. He felt that refugee projects should be carefully linked with economic aid for the indigenous populations for otherwise if anything at all is done for the refugees they would be better off than many of the native inhabitants. Summing up, the Secretary said he thought it is possible on this issue to change the atmosphere as far as the United States is concerned. It need not be all pro-Israel and there were many concrete ways in which the United States could aid the situation. It will not be possible to make everybody happy, he said, but the United States would do the best it could.

7. Arabs Will Cooperate. Prime Minister Salaam responded to this detailed explanation by saying that Arab hopes, which had been raised by the incoming of a new American administration, were clearly well-founded. He realized the many aspects of all these problems and did not want to see a breach between the United States and its allies. However, time was running out and the need was for early solutions. The actions of the previous administration, he said, had given the impression that the United States was dominated by Jewish interests; he hoped sincerely the Secretary's work would not be hampered by domestic political influences, particularly from Congress. Pledging full Arab cooperation, he said America is the stronger party and must take the initiative. America's friends, like himself, looked to that United States leadership. The Prime Minister added a caution that solution to the Egyptian question has highest urgency, for what occurs in Egypt is reflected throughout the Arab world.

8. Churchill Speech. The Prime Minister was gratified that the speech of Prime Minister Churchill had not destroyed the good effect of the Secretary's visit. Mr. Stassen suggested that the reason the Churchill statement did not frustrate the Secretary's endeavors was due to the wisdom of the Secretary who has been dealing with foreign affairs since 1907. Mr. Stassen thought this alone was something which the Arabs could look forward to with hope. There ensued a brief exchange in which the Prime Minister, pointing to today's demonstrations which he described as enormous, stressed the urgency of the Near East situation and Mr. Stassen in reply asked that the new administration be given time to work things out.

9. Pipeline Concessions. In parting the Prime Minister asked the American visitors to do what they could indirectly to induce American oil companies to take a liberal view toward the upward revision of their pipeline agreements with Lebanon. Lebanon needs the money, he said. The British are obstinate on this issue, according to Prime Minister Salaam, and it is his hope that the Americans can be made to be more conciliatory. Time having expired, there was no further discussion.

Present:
Honorable Harold E. Stassen, Mutual Security Administrator	His Excellency Fuad Bey Ammoun, Director-General of Foreign Affairs
Honorable Harold B. Minor, American Ambassador	Halim Bey Abu-Izzudin, Chief of Protocol
Honorable Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary of State
Honorable Douglas MacArthur II, State Department Counselor
Mr. John H. Bruins, Counselor of Embassy
Lieutenant Colonel Stephen Meade, United States Army

1. Opening Remarks. Expressing his pleasure at being in Lebanon, Secretary Dulles explained that his presence and that of Mr. Stassen, during a time when there was much to keep them busy in Washington, testified to the importance which the United States government attaches to the Near East. When Foreign Minister Hakim noted that as an intermediary between East and West, Lebanon had much in common with the latter, the Secretary noted that one of Lebanon's great assets was its Ambassador in Washington Dr. Charles Malik. Recalling Dr. Malik's speech at the Japanese Peace Treaty Conference in San Francisco and his other accomplishments, the Secretary declared that Dr. Malik's voice "carries great authority". The Foreign Minister noted agreement on the basis of his own association with Dr. Malik for several years in Washington.

2. Arab-U.S. "Rift". Citing America's high reputation in the Arab world in times past—due to American schools, Lebanese emigrants in the United States, and the Lebanese' great respect for American ideals—the Foreign Minister reported a widening rift which makes it difficult for Lebanon to play its traditional role. Lebanon is an Arab country, he said, and it must maintain solidarity and common policies with the other Arab states. Speaking as a friend and frankly, he said, he was distressed by the rift and hoped sincerely that the trend could be reversed and the former friendship and love for America restored—all in the general interest of peace and freedom. He noted how Lebanon has cooperated with the West at the United Nations. Lebanon has a strong sense of freedom and democracy, he said, and it is Lebanon's desire that its democratic institutions should grow, despite the fact that all around it the tendency is in the opposite direction. If Lebanon is strengthened and preserved, he concluded, it can continue as in times past to play its useful role between East and West.

3. Purpose of Secretary's Visit. Stating that he had not come to make decisions but to get ideas, the Secretary said he would gladly listen to anything concrete the Foreign Minister might suggest. He was grieved, he said, that a measure of ill will now replaces good will. However, this was due to the acts of a previous administration. A Republican regime is now in power, he stated, and while it will not be possible to obliterate the past (Israel exists and it will continue to exist), it does not preclude the possibility of better friendship to eradicate the scars. The Secretary thought that typical of the foundation on which American-Lebanese friendship can be based is the fact that large numbers of Lebanese emigrants live in the United States. On the personal side, he noted that his sister had lived in Beirut for two years and that his brother was active in affairs which also were of considerable interest to Lebanon.

4. Egypt. Hoping that the United States would do everything possible to re-establish friendship, the Foreign Minister cited Palestine and Egypt as the two most serious outstanding issues. The Secretary replied that he and his party had worked for three days on the Egyptian matter in Cairo and he believed that their presence had prevented the problem from becoming much worse.

5. Relations with Allies. The Secretary said the assumption in this part of the world seems to be that the United States is always siding with Great Britain and France. Asserting that while publicly we appear to agree, the Secretary assured the Foreign Minister that we have many differences with our allies and he cited the current flare-up between certain members of the British Parliament and the American Congress as evidence. There is no reason to conclude, the Secretary said, that the United States has lost its love of freedom and independence which it itself had won 160 years ago. He cited American policy in Cuba and the Philippines to show that the United States is not a colonial-minded power. The Foreign Minister said he realized this full well but he felt the United States, as the world's leading power, should use its great influence on its major allies. Stirring nationalism, he said, cannot be overlooked anymore. The Secretary asked if the Foreign Minister was assuming that the United States does not use its influence and he assured the Foreign Minister that things would be much worse in the world if United States influence were not being exercised.

6. Suez Solution. The Foreign Minister asserted that Egyptian nationalism is genuine, based upon 70 years of unwanted British occupation. If the British had not been there, according to the Foreign Minister, Egypt would have been able to accept MEDO; the presence of the British forced Egypt to reject it. Since you cannot undo the fact that the British were there for 70 years, the Secretary said the problem is what you do about the fact that in that particular area of the world which is important there are bases, landing fields and large amounts of supplies and equipment. The Secretary said the United States is doing everything within its power to find a solution. Abandoning or scuttling the base, he said, is obviously not the best answer, for it would create a vacuum, and that should not happen.

7. Communism is Major Issue. The Secretary stated that in a sense it was a luxury that the people of the Near East could consider Egypt and Palestine their greatest problems. He described how in the larger sphere of global relations the United States wields the balance against Soviet Russia. If that shield were removed, the Arabs would really have something to worry about. He added that if they did not want that shield it could be withdrawn. Citing Stalin's writings of 1924 on "The Problems of Nationalism", the Secretary recalled Stalin's exhortation regarding the use of nationalism to achieve the Soviet goal—an international single socialist state. Stalin's recommended tactic was to use nationalism as a tool to break ties between the powers and their dependencies after which amalgamation with the USSR could take place. If there is no realization of this danger, the Secretary declared, if there is no desire to maintain the balance of power, including the recognition of the Suez power position, then he believed the consequences were indeed serious. He felt this Soviet program was evolving and perhaps it would not be realized until it is too late.

8. Israel Issue Serves Communism. Agreeing with the Secretary's thesis, the Foreign Minister said he was sorry to report that the Soviets were succeeding very well with their tactic. He noted that the refugee problem also lends itself to Communist utilization. He felt, furthermore, that the very creation of Israel had served Soviet policy because it has been used to incite the Arabs against the West. As long as the refugee situation is unsolved, he said, as long as Israel appropriates Arab properties unrightfully, as long as the boundaries and Jerusalem questions are not settled, the situation will get worse and worse and the Communists will exploit it. He felt that was dangerous for both the Arabs and the United States.

9. United States Impartiality. Expressing hope for a solution to the Palestine problem, the Secretary suspected that it would be gradual and not all at once. It was the strong desire of President Eisenhower, he said, to proceed with justice and equity vis-à-vis both parties in this controversy. The past could not be undone, the Secretary stated, but it is possible to proceed from here on with fairness and impartiality. There is a feeling that the past administration was dominated by Jewish influences, he said, but that is not the case with this administration. According to the Secretary, President Eisenhower has a tremendous regard for the Arab peoples and the Arab states. That is primarily the reason for the Secretary's visit to the Near East. They came to visit the Arab states, Israel was included simply because it was in the area. The Secretary said it is his hope to be helpful in the solution of some of these problems. Because of emotional bitterness, with which he could well sympathize, the Secretary realized the difficulty in finding solutions which both sides would consider fair and just. Nevertheless, it would be disastrous if the area were abandoned to strife and struggle, ultimately losing its independence. The Foreign Minister concluded the conversation by expressing his high hopes in the new American administration and stating his belief that it is still not too late to save the Near East.

1. Remarks by Chairman Yafi. The Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of Parliament, Abdulla Bey Yafi, opened the meeting with a prepared statement which he read in French. The general contents had already been reported in the press. He suggested that the United States pursue the following courses of action: a) remove from its mind any possibility of Arab-Israel peace, b) compel Israel to implement UN Resolutions, c) use its influence to stop immigration to Israel, d) give up endeavors for MEDO, e) help Egypt realize its national aspirations, f) support the cause of Arab nationalism generally, and g) provide technical and economic assistance without strings.

2. Secretary's Response. In response, the Secretary expressed his appreciation for the opportunity to meet with the Parliamentary Foreign Affairs Committee. Having had considerable recent experience in facing similar committees in Washington, he appreciated and welcomed the frankness which characterizes such committees in all countries. He declared that the very presence of his delegation in Lebanon was in itself evidence of America's concern with conditions in the Arab world and its desire to do something to improve them. He noted that Congress is in session and this is an extremely busy time in Washington but despite all this, the trip is being made and this should be ample evidence of the new spirit toward the Near East on the part of the new Washington administration. He said he had come to Lebanon not only as a courtesy but to gain all the information he could on which to base United States foreign policy as it pertains to this part of the world. He added that he appreciated the committee Chairman's frankness. Lebanon, he said, understands both the East and West to a unique degree and so what is said here has even greater importance.

3. Soviet Tactics. The Secretary said he wished to take this occasion not merely to comment on mutual problems but to give as a background those major issues which concern the United States and make difficult the treatment of individual problems. He believed that the civilizations which are based on the world's greatest religions and are now in a dominant position, are faced with a force, materialistic in creed and backed by enormous military power, not paralleled in the history of the world. There can be no doubt, he said, of the world-wide aggressive ambitions of Soviet power. One whose judgment he greatly valued in this respect, the Secretary said, is Dr. Charles Malik, who has a very profound understanding of Soviet doctrine. At a private dinner with the Secretary a week previously Dr. Malik had expressed his fear that the United States might soften its policies because of a few kind words recently emanating from the Soviet government. Dr. Malik admonished the Secretary that the Soviet moves were merely a change in tactics, not intentions, and the Secretary assured the Lebanese Ambassador that he had no need for worry as to America's reactions. The danger, the Secretary said, is not only from attacks by the Soviets but even greater that the non-Communist powers will weaken each other as Stalin suggested in one of his last writings in October when he expressed the view that non-Communist nations would fight each other, thus making it unnecessary for the Soviets to fight them. According to the Secretary, the United States feels a two-fold responsibility: a) it is necessary to maintain a strong military establishment (it is costing the U.S. 40 billion dollars per year), and b) it is necessary to maintain unity among the non-Communist countries so that they do not fall into the Communist trap, and the United States is using all its influence in this direction.

4. Relations with Allies. Noting that the Chairman's statement indicated a loss of faith in the United States upholding of the cause of freedom, the Secretary said he did not think peace would be promoted by a serious breach between the United States and its allies, Britain and France. This did not mean, he said, that the United States does not use its influence in many ways, quietly and unostentatiously. For example, he said, the United States has been exerting itself to the utmost in the Egyptian problem looking toward an early and complete evacuation of British troops from the Suez area. It would be more dramatic, he said, to engage in an open crusade but under conditions today that luxury cannot be afforded.

5. Israel. With regard to the question of Israel, the Secretary said that he and his associates were making this visit to seek policies which would be more fair and more just than those of the past, although it, of course, would not be appropriate for him to criticize on foreign soil a preceding government of the United States. The United States has definitely set itself, he said, against any aggressive tendencies by Israel. Already during the last six months, Israel immigration has come to a standstill. The Secretary said he hoped very much that as fear subsides through assurances against aggression there would develop a better relationship and a reduction in tension in this area. He added that the new administration in Washington is seeking approval from Congress for appropriations which would permit the United States to be more even-handed in its aid to the area than heretofore.

6. Regional Defense. With regard to regional defense, the Secretary recognized that security in this area should be sought in ways whereby the people of the area would themselves be primarily responsible. He realized that no collective scheme could be imposed from without.

7. Hope for Future. The Secretary stated that it was his hope that the steps which would be taken by the Washington administration, thoughts concerning which had been stated during his talk, would convince his hearers that a new era in Arab-American relations is opening. He said he wished to close with a plea for greater confidence in each other, faith in America's purposes, and patience and restraint to permit the new administration's policies to develop. He closed with an admonition that it was his understanding that this discussion was in "executive session" and its substance would not be reported outside the walls of the committee room.

Subject: UNRWA and the Palestine Refugees

Participants:

United States	Lebanon
Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State	Leslie J. Carver, Acting Director, UNRWA

---

[1] This conversation took place at the American Embassy in Lebanon.

Honorable Harold E. Stassen, Director, Mutual Security Agency
Honorable Harold B. Minor, American Ambassador
Honorable Douglas MacArthur II, State Department Counselor
Honorable Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary of State
(And Others)
Donald C. Bergus, Acting US Rep, UNRWA

Mr. Carver opened the discussion by stating that UNRWA was a non-political agency but of necessity it worked in a heavily charged political atmosphere. There were three outstanding problems in the area: (a) Anglo-Egyptian relationships; (b) relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors; (c) the Palestine refugees.

It would appear that simultaneous progress on all three problems was an urgent necessity. In the present state of affairs, the UNRWA has been able to do little more than hold the fort as far as the refugee problem is concerned. The original Agency program contemplated an expenditure over a three-year period of $50 million for relief and $200 million for re-integration projects. But two years have passed and the $50 million for relief was just about used up. There has been a definite slowness on the part of Arab Governments to cooperate with the Agency in identifying and executing projects which would lead to refugee rehabilitation. There was the problem of lack of continuity and of administrative capacity on the part of the newly sovereign local states which led to delay. There was also an understandable reluctance on the part of local leaders publicly to identify themselves with a program which seemed to prejudice the refugee claim for repatriation. There were military dictatorships in Syria and Egypt. They were not, however, the same type of totalitarian dictatorship which existed in Europe before World War II. Public opinion counted for a great deal. Colonel Shishikly, for example, states that he faces two problems in cooperating with the Agency: (a) the problem of gaining refugee support for the Agency's program; and (b) the necessity of Syria's engaging in parallel economic activity for the benefit of her own depressed nationals.

Mr. Stassen requested information about the Ramadane project near Damascus. Mr. Carver informed him that there was one rather poor drilling rig on the spot and we hoped to have two modern machines there within a month to continue necessary test-drilling and engineering studies. We were also moving onto the stage where the present tent settlements on the project would be replaced by a more permanent type of village.

After Mr. Carver had reviewed the status of present UNRWA program agreements with the Arab States (agreements involving commitments of $113 million and envisaging resettlement of 322,000 refugees), the Secretary asked how our agreements were connected with refugee settlement. Mr. Carver pointed out that these present program agreements would be supplemented by project agreements which very definitely linked UNRWA expenditure with refugee resettlement.

Mr. Byroade asked for Mr. Carver's opinion on the Yarmuk scheme. Mr. Carver said that he had just recently visited the site of the proposed dam at Maqarin and had been greatly impressed. He understood that the natural conditions for constructing a dam in that spot were superb. There were two other problems connected with the project, however, that would involve considerable further study. They were: (a) the fact that the Yarmuk joins the Jordan in territory now in the hands of Israel; (b) the fact that the waters of the Yarmuk alone would probably suffice only to irrigate the East Bank of the Jordan Valley. Irrigation of the HKJ section of the West Bank of the Valley would require a considerable amount of fresh water from the Jordan River itself. If Israel's current plans for development of the upper waters of the Jordan should be carried out, development of the West Bank of the HKJ section of the Valley would be impractical.

Mr. Byroade asked if repatriation were to be offered to the refugees tomorrow, would they return? Mr. Carver expressed the opinion that although a large number of refugees might wish to return, very few would probably wish to remain. There was doubtless no question of their returning to their original homes and farms. They would have to compete with Israeli nationals for the limited resources within Israel. A form of repatriation could be the settlement of refugees in areas relinquished by Israel in a peace settlement. Thus it was estimated that 100,000 refugees could find their livelihood in the International Zone of Jerusalem; perhaps 100,000 in Western Galilee; a few thousand in the area of an Egyptian-Jordan corridor through the Nejob.

Mr. Stassen inquired about the possibility of compensation. Mr. Carver pointed out that according to the latest studies made by the Palestine Conciliation Commission, the larger share of compensation would go to wealthier refugees not presently receiving UNRWA relief. Mr. Bergus stated that even if full compensation were to be paid, there would still remain 400,000 to 500,000 refugees who would require outside assistance before they could be self-supporting.

The Secretary closed the discussion by expressing the appreciation of the U.S. Government of the difficult task which UNRWA was facing.

1. Deteriorating Situation in the Near East. Dr. Carleton opened the discussion by remarking that he and his three associates represented altogether over 100 years of association with the Near East. They regretted to report that the situation in this area is worse than it was several years ago, that frustration is deeper, and that there exists fundamentally a keen sense of insecurity. They feared that this disintegration is not only detrimental to United States interests, but is tragic for the area itself. At the root of the trouble, of course, was Israel, against whom the Arabs are conducting a cold war of much greater importance to them than the cold war against Russia. Dr. Carleton reported Colonel Shishikli had told him recently that not one significant case can be cited where the United States has said no to Israel. Unless America does something, Dr. Carleton said, it is no use to talk to the Arabs at all. Colonel Eddy later asserted that the United States has lost its

"bargaining power" and that the situation is reaching the bottom, as in Iran, where the local inhabitants do not expect anything and cannot be bargained with. He stated that at the forthcoming meeting of Arab Finance Ministers, discussions would take place to use oil as a weapon against the West. The alternative to remedial action by the United States was "awful", according to Colonel Eddy, who believes the Shishikli, Naguib and Chamoun regimes may be America's last chance. Dr. Johnson said the Arabs have lost faith in disinterested help from America. No Arab leader can stick his neck out to collaborate with the West, he said.

2. Jerusalem. Colonel Eddy reported that he passed through Jerusalem two days after the Secretary's party and found there utter sadness at the Secretary's having contributed to the violation of the UN resolution regarding Jerusalem by dining with Israeli officials in Jerusalem. Colonel Eddy also recalled that the U.S. Ambassador had acceded to Israeli wishes by attending the inauguration ceremony in Jerusalem. If we are not able, Colonel Eddy said, to do anything for the Holy City of Jerusalem, the Arabs can see no help from us. When Dr. Carleton suggested the Israelis should be pushed back, the Secretary asked who would do it. The Secretary also asked what was Jordan's attitude toward internationalization. Dr. Carleton explained Jordan opposed simply because they have no faith in UN and that if UN took over Jerusalem's administration, the entire city would soon be an annex to Israel. Colonel Eddy was also sure that Israel would score a fait accompli. He agreed that practically it would be most difficult to carry out internationalization, but he insisted that the United States should not meet the Israelis in Jerusalem. He reiterated that Israel was clearly violating a specific UN Resolution. The Secretary pointed out that UN Resolutions are only recommendations, and that the tendency is for each interested party to expect the other fellow to live up to the resolution with which the interested party is concerned. He noted that the Arabs were first to oppose the 1947 resolution and did so with violence. Now they want to return to that resolution which they could have had five years ago.

3. Asylum in U.S. for Arab Refugees. When Mr. Byroade asked just what the United States could or should do, one suggestion made by Dr. Stoltzfus was that the United States might offer to take in a token number of Arab refugees to show our good will. Such a gesture would soften Arab attitudes. The Assistant Secretary replied that this proposal has been given thorough consideration and the answer usually was that such a move would be a sign to the Arabs that we do not really understand their problem. Dr. Johnson suggested that it not be a single isolated proposal but that it be a part of a whole program. Compensation, he said, is a psychological as well as a financial problem.

4. United States Attitude. The Secretary declared that there is not the slightest tendency for the present administration to be pro-Jewish, since it is not under any obligation whatsoever to Jewish interests. What the administration must do, he said, is what is good for the United States. It is not easy, the Secretary pointed out, to view favorably the steps of what one might call a pro-Arab policy. It would require, for example, a position against the United Kingdom in Egypt and that meant turning over about the only strong point in the Near East to chaos. Not only would that strength be wiped out but there would indeed be, as General Robertson had told him, a state of war between Egypt and the United Kingdom. It would be impossible, therefore, to have both a pro-UK and a pro-Arab policy. The Secretary indicated that there is a present British tendency to work out an alliance with Israel, basing their thinking on hard-headed military realities concerning the Suez and the Near East. The question arises shall the United States see these strong points (Suez and Israel) wiped out in the Near East. In the ensuing uproar, Colonel Eddy gained the floor and said that as a former U.S. military observer he could state that never would Israel serve usefully as a striking force for us. All that would happen would be that the perimeter of hate would be enlarged. Israel conceivably could move into Amman, Damascus and Beirut, but staying there would be another question and United States forces would be required to occupy every Arab village and town in the event of global conflict. The Secretary stated he was not advocating this course of action, but it appears to be current Churchillian theory, and he posed the theory in order to get answers from the visitors present. He added that the British even had an occasional thought about occupying Cairo and Alexandria. Dr. Carleton this time gained the floor and declared that any linking of the Suez and Israel issues would be fatal. Israel, he said, must be frozen in its tracks. The Secretary reiterated that he was merely looking for answers. Past U.S. policies were bad, and he was asking provocative questions to obtain useful ideas.

5. Secretary's Thinking re Israel. The Secretary then outlined his current thinking on the Israel question and wondered whether this thinking was sufficiently drastic. Specifically, he believed:

(a) The presence in the Arab world of the Secretary and his associates was in itself a noteworthy and helpful measure.

(b) Under legislation currently being sought from Congress, increasing aid is planned for the Arab States. This is a break with the past.

(c) The United States Government should consider some form of guarantee against Israeli expansion. Colonel Eddy insisted it be a U.S. not a UN measure.

(d) Something should be done to create a military balance between the Arabs and Israelis. Israel now is much the stronger, which in itself is an inducement to aggression. He realized also that by building up Arab military potential, we run the risk of stoking the fires for a second round against the Israelis.

(e) Formal peace is not possible in the near future. It will have to come bit by bit, gradually.

(f) Full internationalization of Jerusalem would require troops which we are not willing to commit. Therefore, some sort of international control other than outright internationalization appears most practical.

(g) Joint border controls should be promoted. The Secretary mentioned progress in this direction during his visit to Israel and Jordan.

Colonel Eddy thought that the Arab boycott of Israel was the last phase of past developments in that issue and that the elimination of the boycott should not be pushed until Israelis expansion has been frozen. The Secretary replied that perhaps the control of Israel's subsidy could be used to stop Israeli expansion and he noted that this tool has already had a salutary effect on Israeli immigration. Decrease in subsidy, furthermore, has caused unemployment to rise in Israel, which while not a happy thing, was in this case a stabilizing factor.

All the above things, the Secretary said, might ease the tensions, eventually permitting us to proceed with building strength in the area. The time factor, however, is important, and better results would be likely if the Egyptian stumbling block can be removed.

In closing, the Secretary thanked the four American "Near East hands", and said he appreciated the opportunity to put up the problems to them in the general quest for solutions.

The meeting commenced about 9:45 a. m. Mr. Peter summarized the structure of the Point Four operations in Lebanon, pointing out that the major staffs in Water Resources, Agriculture, Health, Education, and Industry corresponded to the Technical Ministries of the Government of Lebanon in these fields. The major emphasis by the Government of Lebanon upon water resources development was reflected by a heavy stress on this field in the Point Four program, in which the Litani River Survey was the largest project. He pointed out that there were no joint fund or servicio operations in Lebanon, but that each of the Point Four technical staffs worked with the ministries under cooperative project agreements describing specific activities. On the American Point Four staff, there are 48 technicians and 15 program direction staff including secretaries. Mr. Peter also described the organizational relationship with the Government of Lebanon at the general policy planning level, accomplished through a Provisional Liaison Committee established by President Chamoun and chaired by Mr. George Hakim who is now also Chairman of the new Economic Development Council.

Mr. Peter described the chronology of the Point Four program, indicating that the bulk of the projects had been signed this last spring even though project activities had been initiated some months earlier. The 3.1 million dollars of program funds committed by the Program Agreement of June 26, 1952 was being used over the two fiscal years, 1952 and 1953, due to delays in getting the co-operative program under way.

He emphasized the economic development activities initiated by the Government of Lebanon, including the establishment of the Economic Development Council, and the beginning of a five-year plan for economic development, the establishment of a four-year developmental budget of 25 million pounds allocated almost exclusively to water resources development projects, and the discussion with the Government of a Regional Development bank and a Lebanese Industrial and Agricultural Bank. He mentioned the importance of the regional economy to Lebanon due to its location as the gateway to the Near East and its inter-dependence with the other countries in the Near East in its transportation, commercial and banking services. At the same time, there does not appear to be a great potential within Lebanon for regional development projects, except possibly highways, port development, and the international river Orontes, and certainly no possibility of re-settling any appreciable number of refugees. Mr. Peter pointed out that within the Point Four program in Lebanon, there were important regional aspects for tourism, marketing of agricultural production, and the Industry Institute which was expected to become a service institute to industries throughout the region as well as in Lebanon. He mentioned also that Lebanon was the headquarters of the Regional Locust Control and the location of the American University of Beirut Regional Training Program.

On the subject of economic aid, Mr. Peter emphasized that no economic aid should be offered to Lebanon until there was more evidence that the Government of Lebanon was doing its best to use available sources of capital and outside financing, such as the IBRD, the Export and Import Bank, and private investors. He pointed out that for some projects, such as the Litani, there might be a need for a small amount of economic aid if the project were not completely bankable; and that for certain other regional projects, such as highways or international rivers, there might be a later need for some economic aid. However, since Lebanon cannot settle additional refugees and has a limited amount of land which can be brought under irrigation, there is not as large an argument for economic aid as in some of the surrounding countries; and it is particularly important that U.S. economic aid in Lebanon not become a substitute for efforts which might be expected of the Lebanese Government.

Mr. Stassen inquired particularly about the Litani Survey Project, and Mr. Herdman, Project Engineer, gave a more detailed report on the accomplishments of the Litani staff to date, and the possibilities indicated by the studies already completed. Mr. Stassen emphasized his own belief that providing additional irrigated land was the most important use of water and should take precedence over using water for producing electric power since the oil supplies of the region might be used for providing power at approximately the same cost in Lebanon. Mr. Herdman pointed out that the cost-benefit studies indicated a much higher return from hydro-electric power use than from irrigation, but that intangible benefits of settling families on irrigated land would have to receive heavy weight. He also described the technical difficulty involved in the Litani Project where most of the irrigable land is above the water-storage sites. The proposed irrigation system of the South Bekaa was discussed in some detail. Mr. Herdman also described the political difficulties associated with the Litani Survey due to the great fear on the part of the Lebanese that the project would in some way benefit Israel or be vulnerable to Israeli aggression.

At the request of Mr. Stassen, Dr. Cannon described the Agricultural Program in Lebanon, including the three experimental farms now being used by Point Four in cooperation with the Ministry of Agriculture and the research work on new types of seed. He also described the Livestock Breeding Program briefly. In the course of this discussion, the difficulties encountered in obtaining supplies and equipment from the states was mentioned, and Mr. Stassen showed particular interest in these delays in procurement.

Time did not permit any discussion of UN Technical Assistance activities or their relation to the bilateral program in Lebanon.

The meeting closed at approximately 10:20 a.m. as Mr. Stassen was scheduled to depart with Secretary Dulles for their next meeting.

The Ambassador in Iraq (Berry) to the Department of State [1]

TOP SECRET PRIORITY BAGHDAD, May 17, 1953—11 a. m.

1373. Section one of two. For the President from Secretary.

[1] Transmitted in two sections.

Have now completed visit to Israel and four surrounding Arab countries, Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. Impressions follow:

1. Bitterness toward West, including United States such that while Arab good will may still be restored, time is short before loss becomes irretrievable. Mind general Arab feeling of hope in you as individual and head of new administration, but basic skepticism as to whether any United States administration can follow policies now approved by Zionists. Remaining hope will quickly dissolve unless our acts seem here to show capacity to influence British and Israeli policies, which now tend to converge in what is looked upon as new phase of aggression against Arabs. Have vigorously and consistently emphasized need for time and have stressed danger which would flow from open split of West Powers, and believe some impression made, but period within which we should get going must be measured in weeks, not months.

2. United Kingdom-Egypt problem [2] most dangerous and if unsolved situation will find Arab world in open and united hostility to West and in some cases receptive to Soviet aid. The recent statement by Churchill linking Israel to the Suez question [3] leads to the feeling here that he is prepared to stand by force if necessary in Egypt, make military arrangements with Israel, and thus to abandon any British position in Arab states except as held by force. It is hard to believe this is correct appraisal of United Kingdom policy, but if it should be accepted here, any hope of extending United States influence over the Near East and building at least a minimum of strength here would have to be renounced unless we would publicly disagree with Britain and thus allow accomplishment of one of primary aims of Soviet Russia.

3. As previously reported, Naguib and Revolutionary Committee agreed try to postpone guerrilla type hostilities against British until we could return and perhaps moderate the British position. We have urged other Arab state leaders to urge moderation on Naguib and believe some may have done so. However, we should be prepared to get quick results on return. Suggest State and Defense consider our suggested formula cabled from American Embassy Cairo [4] and also our conclusion that Middle East Defense Organization in original form is impracticable. Question of approach to British in this matter should be thought about in framework of other issues. As to this I look forward to talk with you on return.

[2] For documentation on U. S. interest in relations between the United Kingdom and Egypt, see Documents 947 ff.

[4] Not further identified.

4. Convinced after talks with Arab leaders and Americans here that formal Arab-Israel peace settlement not yet possible. Indeed, Ben-Gurion himself talked in terms of de facto peace and end of economic hostilities, rather than in terms of formal over-all peace settlement. He also favored United States adopt policies which would win Arab favor and thus permit US exert helpful influence in entire area. Our feeling is we may have to move step by step upon segments of problem that will reduce tension to where it would be politically possible for Arab leaders to agree to formal peace settlement. Such segments include gradual liquidation refugee problem, status of Jerusalem, assurance against Israeli aggression, to which Israeli leaders agree, distribution of economic and military aid showing more balance between Arab and Israel countries, et cetera.

5. Believe that if problem of Israel peace and Arab good will is dealt with on piecemeal basis, there need not be identical approach as regards all Arab countries. We had come here with belief Egypt afforded best opportunity for Arab leadership toward better relations with Israel and the West. However, we believe that present British tension even if presently relieved will be recurrent so long as any British remain in the area, and we shall be under corresponding pressure from British to withhold military and economic aid to Egypt. Also we feel Naguib is primarily a popular figure through which revolutionary group operates and that dominant factors have little political experience or understanding of international problem.

6. Syria offers some promise. Shishikli has both personal authority and understanding of world situation. Syria furthermore has greater opportunity for economic development at less cost and is only Arab country that could absorb large amount of refugees and thus make good start for liquidation problems which poisons all Arab relations. Also Syria less engrossed with Suez problem and more aware of Soviet threat, because of proximity of Soviet frontier. While no one can guarantee tenure or even life of dictator like Shishikli, he seems able and disposed to take initiative. However, Syria very unpopular with neighbors and no adequate substitute for Egypt if UK problem there could be solved.

7. We do not now make specific recommendations, but think useful supply promptly orientation of our thinking so that you and NSC may also be thinking along similar lines with view to developing readiness for prompt policy decisions upon our return.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in Iraq [1]

CONFIDENTIAL

BAGHDAD, May 18, 1953.

Subject: Iraq

Participants:

United States

Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State
Honorable Harold E. Stassen, Mutual Security Administrator
Honorable Douglas MacArthur, II, State Department Counselor
Honorable Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary of State
The Ambassador
Mr. Philip Ireland

Iraq

Jamil al Madfai, Prime Minister
Ali Jawdat al-Ayubi, Deputy Prime Minister
Tawfiq al-Suwaidi, Foreign Minister
Nuri Said, Minister of Defense
Musa Shahbander, Ambassador-designate to the United States
Yusuf Gaiiani Under Secretary, Foreign Affairs

The Prime Minister:

1. In his statement of welcome to the Secretary, Prime Minister said he was happy to see the Secretary visiting this area in these troubled times. He said he was particularly pleased to see him in Iraq which, being closer to the danger, was therefore appreciative of the difficulties of its position.

2. Palestine was the greatest obstacle to improvement of relations between US and Iraq. A settlement should be made in the interest of equity and justice, and to restore confidence in the US. Not until it was settled could the Iraq Government have a basis for creating public opinion in favor of mutual defense arrangements. Iraqis were far from satisfied with UN treatment of Palestine, but if an initial step were necessary, the Iraqi Government could discuss peace only on the basis of the UN resolution. In urging necessity of a just solution, The Prime Minister declared that, in the absence of such solution, Israel would find ways to expand at the expense of the Arabs in this area.

3. The Arab world was disturbed, not only by the situation in Palestine, but also by that of North Africa, which, unless a settlement were attained, would make it impossible for the Arabs to come to the aid of their Allies and friends.

Tawfiq al-Suwaidi, Foreign Minister:

1. The Foreign Minister declared that Iraqis were lovers of peace, interested only in peaceful pursuits and in developing their country. The Iraq Government was fostering the policy of development since it would remove the basis for extremists' agitation among the people.

2. The most necessary requirement of Iraq's foreign policy was the restoration of confidence of Iraq toward the western world. After reviewing the reasons for the lack of such confidence—the rise of colonialism after World War I and the question of Palestine—he stated that if the question of cooperation between the Arabs and the West were raised, the Arab answer to such request was now that, on the basis of experience, the West had forfeited the right of being believed. The unjust settlement of Palestine and the creation of hundreds of thousands of homeless Arab refugees had further stimulated public opinion against the West. Arab political leaders were now unable to win public opinion to the support of the West. The Foreign Minister said he personally regretted that the US, which had enunciated the principle of freedom for small peoples, had acted contrary to such principles in regard to Palestine. Public opinion, therefore, held the US responsible for the present inequitable situation. The UN was also held responsible since the resolutions and promises, although inequitable, had not even been carried out.

3. The Foreign Minister wished the Secretary to understand that Iraq had no sympathy whatever with the politics or doctrines coming from the North, i.e. Soviet Russia. The whole tradition of Arabs was against such sympathy. He stated, "If you are against communism, we are also against it. We are handicapped, however, because of public opinion." He urged the Secretary to give close attention to the psychological aspects of the Palestine situation in order that public opinion might be won to the side of the West.

4. He also stated that as long as various parts of the Arab world, such as North Africa, were dominated by imperialist countries, there was no chance of cooperation between the Arabs and the West. He reviewed the situation in North Africa as the Arabs and Moslems saw it and added the question of North Africa to those which must be solved in the near future.

5. Stating that the difficulties in the world were as links in a chain, the Foreign Minister pointed out that Iraq, as a close neighbor of Iran, was affected by whatever happened in that "unhappy country". He regarded the situation in Iran as being very bad. [2] The question of Iran must be added to those of Palestine and North Africa, as one which must be settled in the very near future.

6. In summary, the Foreign Minister said when the legacies from the past were removed, Iraq would be willing to cooperate.

Minister of Defense, Nuri Said:

1. The Minister of Defense stated that since 1934 Iraq had been aware of communism as a dangerous doctrine which had pretended to be working for progress and a better life but the real purpose of which was destruction and terrorism. Iraq had passed legislation with penalties for communist action running up to capital punishment. Certain powers, including Great Britain, had urged that such laws were too rigorous. He was pleased to see, however, that the United States had recognized the danger of communism and was now strengthening its laws against it.

The Minister then reviewed the defense plans of the Iraq Government, much on the lines of that already given to the Embassy and forwarded to the Department (his notes on the requirements were given to Mr. Byroade). [3]

The Minister used a map to illustrate the common defense problem of Turkey, Iran and Iraq. Recognition of these problems had been the basis of the Sa'aabad Pact. Talks had been held during coronation week with the Foreign Ministers of Iran and Turkey. The Iranian Foreign Minister had recognized the problem and had promised to discuss the matter with his Government. The Turk had reported that his country was fully aware of the danger. The Defense Minister stressed the danger from Russia and declared that Iraq's sole objective was its defense.

He urged that the Secretary and the United States Government give consideration to the defense program which he had outlined, since Iraq would be unable, without severely crippling itself, to undertake a program of such magnitude. The ordinary revenues would be severely dipped into as it was. To further reduce the oil revenues would seriously and adversely affect the development of Iraq which the Government of Iraq held to be vital to the well-being and progress of the country. Iraq would, of course, do what it could by itself, but he was afraid Iraq's own efforts would be insufficient. He again urged that Iraq be given aid and assistance.

2. Nuri then turned to the two problems which formed psychological obstacles to full cooperation between Iraq and the United States: the questions of Palestine and the status of the refugees.

[2] For documentation on this subject, see volume x.

[3] Not found in Department of State files.

The solution to these questions should be simple. Israel, created by the UN, should obey resolutions as approved and passed by the UN. Of course, if Israel insisted that its right to territory was based on the right of conquest, and he denied such right, nothing could convince the Israelis to give up such land except the force of arms. Iraq counted upon the US to convince the Israelis of the error of their ways since US had played a great part in the creation of Israel and without its support there would be no Israel today. Nuri said from his own talks with General Romulo and others, he was aware how pressure had been exerted by the US during the few days before the 1947 resolution was passed. US had a moral position for the creation of Israel. "No other power," he said, "can solve the Israel-Arab problem except the US."

3. Egypt was another problem for the Arabs. He hoped this would be settled very soon. He had news that morning which made him believe that the Anglo-Egyptian differences would be settled very soon.

4. Ambassador Berry then asked Nuri Said if he would tell the Secretary something about Iraq's plans for the training of students as officers. Nuri replied that an old law concerning the training of students, hitherto not applied, was being modified. It would be applied as soon as it was passed by the Senate. Instead of taking nine months of a student's time after he had finished college, the student would be taken during his college career for 3-month periods of training for three successive summers. He anticipated 3500 students would be put into camp for training during the coming summer. In 1954 the same plan would be followed. After two 3-month periods training, the students would be given commissions as second lieutenants of the Reserve. During the third summer the students would be separated into their specializations and given practical training. The Ambassador commented that the law seemed a wise one since it not only removed students from the capital during the summer when they might indulge in mischief, but also formed a cadre of responsible officers.

5. In response to another question concerning area cooperation, Nuri pointed out that Turkey was strong and ran less risk than Iran, which was weak, of being attacked. The Iran-Iraq frontier south of Turkey was therefore in great danger from international situation. Kurds were being trained in Russia under Mulla Mustafa. For protection of this area, he stated that plans had been worked out with the British. Iraq's job would be to stop the Russians as long as possible at the frontier. Nuri stated the defense of Iraq was the policy of this government. It was Iraq's only policy. The arms expansion program was not for aggression. It was for defense, self-defense, and in the areas from which the danger would come—the northeastern and eastern frontiers.

Foreign Minister, Tawfiq al-Suwaidi:

The Foreign Minister then stated that in accordance with present plans, Iraq had the intention to cooperate with other countries on the same basis as with the other Arab countries. Iraq required aid and assistance. Iraq requested such aid. If such assistance were not forthcoming, Iraq would try to do what it could. It had an alliance with Great Britain and, through cooperation with it and the Arab countries, Iraq would be able to do something. This would be insufficient. He declared that any power asking Iraq cooperation and giving aid and assistance would be welcome.

Suwaidi then informed the Secretary that the Arab League Political Committee at Cairo had decided that the military experts of the Arab States should not meet until after two months to formulate their plans for self-defense, in order to permit Egypt and Great Britain to solve outstanding problems. Egypt would thereby be enabled to take its place in the Arab League Collective System.

The Secretary:

The Secretary thanked the group for the statements which he found frank and helpful. The Secretary then made a clear and impressive exposé of the dangers from Soviet policy, particularly in regard to nationalism and the creation of divisions among the free nations, and how the United States proposed to meet such dangers. In conclusion he stated that he believed a new look would be taken at US policy toward the Middle East. The Middle East must not expect any miracles; it must not expect anything soon. Nevertheless, he believed that a fresh start would be made.

CONFIDENTIAL — BAGHDAD, May 18, 1953.

ST D-6/1

Subject: Iraq

[1] This conversation took place at the office of the President of the Chamber of Deputies.

Participants:

United States	Iraq
Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State	Dr. Fadhil al Jamali, President of the Chamber of Deputies
Ambassador Berry
Mr. Philip Ireland

Dr. Jamali informed the Secretary that the basic problems between Iraq and the United States had been inherited from the past. The first was the continuance of colonialism, as in North Africa. The second one was Palestine, where Israel had been established without regard to human rights. He hoped that the US would be able to alter its policy in regard to both of these countries.

Legacies had also been left by the colonial policy of Great Britain in Egypt and Iraq. These were being gradually corrected. He declared that in time the military bases in each of these countries must be evacuated and returned to the Egyptians and Iraqis for safe-guarding.

In regard to Palestine, he said that the UN resolutions had not been just but with the passage of time they had been accepted by the Arabs. Arab leaders, however, could not, in deference to public opinion, accept less than the UN resolution concerning Palestine as a basis of peace with Israel. Internationalization of Jerusalem was essential because it was the sacred city of three religions and of all the races of mankind. The basis of division regarding frontiers must be those set up by the UN resolutions of 1947 or their equivalent. If territorial and boundary adjustments took place in accordance with the resolution of 1947, such adjustment would solve two-thirds of the refugee problem.

Jamali then turned to North Africa, in the discussion of which he became somewhat heated. The treatment of North Africa was a typical case of colonialism and imperialism. He criticized the US for backing France in its colonialism. The US might be giving good counsel to the French Government but in view of recent French actions, it was difficult to prove this fact in public opinion. He urged that the US openly oppose France in order to prevent the nationalists of North Africa from turning to communism. It was impossible to fight communism without an appeal to public opinion.

Dr. Jamali stated that opposition to communism in Iraq was based on ideological factors, but unless such ideological factors were strongly reinforced, they would form no obstacle to communism. Dr. Jamali then returned to the question of bases in Egypt and Iraq. He declared that the bases must be given back to the people and the Iraqis and Egyptians given help to maintain them. He believed in common defense and he thought that most Iraqis also believed in it.

In regard to Iraq's defense, he stated that money from oil should be spent on development, not on military expansion. Yet since military expansion was essential, Iraq should be helped by the US in its own interest. He declared that America had neglected Iraq. It had given assistance to Saudi Arabia, to Pakistan, to Iran, but had always skipped over Iraq. Iraq had the greatest potentialities of any Arab country. He wanted something substantially American in this country. America should come forward with substantial and real assistance in establishing technical schools and other projects for the development of Iraq.

The Secretary stated that he appreciated Dr. Jamali's exposé to which he had no time to make a reply except on the matter of our relationships with France and Great Britain. Dr. Jamali had implied that the US was in complete partnership with the colonial policy of France and Great Britain. He wished, in reply, to state emphatically that this was not so. Privately and behind the scenes influence was being constantly brought to bear on these governments to moderate their policy. The policy of the US was against open clash, hence there had been no pushing of these questions in the UN. He urged Dr. Jamali not to push the questions of North Africa openly or in the UN since it would only serve communist strategy of creating division among the western powers. Only our enemies could profit by such maneuvers.

Dr. Jamali replied that unless some action was taken before the next General Assembly, the West would be faced by a combined bloc of Arab-Asian powers to force the North Africa question out in the open. To this the Secretary again replied to do so would be playing the communist game. Dr. Jamali said that if he were given assurance that something would be done within one, two or even three years, he could restrain action, but without such assurance he was certain matters would come to a head at the next session.

The Secretary	The King [Ibn Saud]
Mr. Stassen	Crown Prince Saud
Ambassador Hare	Prince Faisal, Foreign Minister
Mr. Byroade	Sheikh Yussef, Deputy Foreign Minister, and two advisors

Summary

The King initiated the conversation by asking whether there was anything Mr. Dulles wished to discuss. Mr. Dulles replied that he was ready for any discussion in connection with the existing friendship of their two nations. Mr. Dulles continued, saying all that he had in mind was the development of friendly relations between their two countries and that these friendly relations must be stronger now than ever before. As proof of such belief, Mr. Dulles said, President Eisenhower had sent him and Mr. Stassen on this visit to Saudi Arabia to get in touch personally with the King. Mr. Dulles pointed out that this was clear evidence of the keen interest the United States had in Saudi Arabia. He said he could not foretell the policy which would be formed after his return to the U.S., but he believed it would be a more understanding policy and stronger than it was in the past. He said that America has great responsibilities all over the world and cannot meet them as she alone pleases. It is President Eisenhower's policy, Mr. Dulles stated, to consider the whole world equally, without neglecting any part of it. Mr. Dulles added that the U.S. believes there is a threat of war by the communists and does not like to put any pressures on activities which might cause a split between the forces facing this common enemy.

The King stated that he agreed with what Mr. Dulles said, but he asked whether or not the U.S. would like to have some more friends to cooperate in such a cause. Mr. Dulles said yes, the U.S. would like to have such friends. The King then inquired regarding the attitude of the U.S. toward Saudi Arabia. Mr. Dulles replied that he and his party were in Saudi Arabia to emphasize the friendship exisiting between their two countries. The King then replied that Saudi Arabia had had a heavy blow. Mr. Dulles inquired regarding the nature of this heavy blow. The King said Mr. Dulles was well acquainted with it from the reports he was receiving. Mr. Dulles requested further explanation.

The King then said he would frankly relate what he had on his mind. At the same time he did not want to bother his friends by asking them for something that could not be done; but if his friends had deserted him, he wished to know what the situation was. Mr. Dulles replied that, in fact, the U.S. had not deserted him, and that this visit to Saudi Arabia was proof of what he was saying. The King then said that Saudi Arabia had treated America sincerely and cordially on the basis that America would be firm in its friendship toward Saudi Arabia, that it would not change its policies according to circumstances, and that both countries would be working toward one aim. Upon Mr. Dulles' request for further explanation, the King replied that, as Mr. Dulles knew, Saudi Arabia had enjoyed an old friendship with the British, and that the British would change their policies amazed him. The King continued, saying Saudi Arabia had learned that this change of policy by the British was the result of the friendship of Saudi Arabia with America, particularly after Saudi Arabia had given the oil concession to the U.S. As a result, the British had adopted a counter policy and had begun to chase Saudi subjects from their own country. (The King was referring to the Buraimi situation. [2]) The King added he was sure that Mr. Dulles, as Secretary of State, was well acquainted with the dispute between Saudi Arabia and Britain, particularly as it had been explained by his son Faisal when he was in America, and he had been expecting to hear from Mr. Dulles for some time about it. The King said that the British used to call him "a man of the black night," but that now they were calling him an aggressor. The King continued, saying that for a long time he had been explaining to America the dispute existing between him and the British, but with no result. The King said he was sure Mr. Dulles would not give him false promises and hollow words, as he was weighing so carefully what he was saying.

Mr. Dulles said that when Prince Faisal was in America they discussed this subject and exchanged notes with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden when they were in Washington. He said the U.S. urged the British not to take any aggressive measures and to take action which would maintain the prestige and the honor of the King. The King said all he wanted to do was to maintain his rights. Mr. Dulles said it was possible for the U.S. to use its influence but it was not in possession of the authority to dictate policy to any other state. The King replied that, such being the case, he was sure Saudi Arabia's rights would be lost and that the obligation given by the U.S. was of no value. Mr. Dulles again reiterated that although the U.S. was using its influence with the British, the U.S. could not dictate policy to them, any more than it could to Saudi Arabia. Mr. Dulles added, however, that the U.S. had some influence with the British, and he considered that the subject had not yet been closed. The King said all he wanted to do was to determine who the aggressor was and to stop him. Mr. Dulles said the U.S. was not the lord of the world, but only one country. The King said all he wanted was for the U.S. to execute its promises given in the letter sent to him by President Truman and confirmed by President Eisenhower. Mr. Dulles requested that the King permit him to discuss the details with the Ambassador, as he would like to know about this letter. The King said he could discuss it with the Ambassador and meet tomorrow with the people of Saudi Arabia to discuss the subject again. Mr. Dulles commented that President Eisenhower had taken over the duties of President only three months ago and, although working extremely hard, had not acquainted himself with everything.

Mr. Dulles then said that before taking leave of the King, he would like to express his thanks for his kindness and hospitality. He said President Eisenhower had sent with him a simple gift, from one friend to another. After the King had accepted the gift, Mr. Dulles said Mr. Stassen and all of his group joined him in expressing thanks for the generosity and welcome, by which they were overwhelmed. Mr. Stassen remarked that he would like to join the Secretary in expressing thanks. He continued, saying that having heard what was on the King's mind, he believed it would be of help in studying this situation which was of such great concern to the King. The King then said, addressing the American group, that the main point was that they were not living up to their promises and that if the British had a single proof that the area under discussion was theirs, he was ready to accept such proof. But that, on the other hand, he had the proof that the area was his father's and forefathers' for over five hundred years. Mr. Dulles then asked permission to depart.

Crown Prince Saud welcomed Mr. Dulles and his party and expressed pleasure over the opportunity to talk to them personally about matters uppermost in Saudi minds, even though Prince Faisal had done this in detail when in Washington. It was desirable, His Highness continued, to rediscuss the same subjects frankly, because frankness was the only basis on which these problems could be worked out.

The U.S. representatives, he said, were aware of Saudi Arabia's friendship toward America and of the fact that she was placing great hope on this friendship and was hoping for more and more to come out of it. He then pointed out that there were two points to discuss. First, the American Government's readiness to fulfill the obligation given by the previous President of the U.S. and reaffirmed by President Eisenhower. Second, the attitude of the United States toward the British. He then inquired whether the final U.S. attitude was in favor of the British or whether the U.S. expected more details from Saudi Arabia in order to reconsider? His Government, Prince Saud continued, did not know whether Saudi Arabia had yet gained the friendship of the U.S. and whether the U.S. would support her. If not, he said, Saudi Arabia would have to find some other way to maintain her interests. He requested the Americans to express their attitude toward Saudi Arabia in frankness and said that on the basis of such an expression of attitude, Saudi Arabia could establish her policy. He noted that this was a summary of what Prince Faisal had explained to the Americans in detail and a subject on which his Government was still awaiting a reply.

Prince Faisal remarked that what Prince Saud had said in connection with the dispute between Saudi Arabia and Britain [2] was not the only subject which they would like to discuss. He said there was still another question, but they wished first to know the attitude of the U.S. regarding the dispute before proceeding to the next discussion.

Mr. Dulles replied that the dispute did not appear to be a matter which would be covered by the promises given in the letter sent by President Truman. Prince Saud said on the contrary, his Government believed it was included, because the letter guaranteed against any aggression toward Saudi Arabia, and the forceful action taken by the British in the area being discussed was considered to be real aggression. Mr. Dulles replied that the letter, as he recalled it, stated that the U.S. would be interested in the continuance of the integrity and independence of Saudi Arabia and that any aggression against Saudi Arabia would be of concern to the U.S. Mr. Dulles added that a dispute such as the one over Buraimi appeared to him to be confined only to boundaries and could not be included under the heading of aggression. This divergence of views regarding the nature of the Buraimi dispute, he continued, was similiar to the difference of views which took place between many countries, as it had between America and Canada and between America and Mexico.

The Crown Prince replied that this was not a boundary dispute but was an aggression against the Saudi Kingdom. He and his Government considered it aggression, because that area had been in possession of the King's fathers and forefathers; and he said that if America would not accept Saudi proof, there was nothing more to be done. Prince Saud expressed the view that the British would not agree to a plebiscite because they knew the people living in that area were subjects of Saudi Arabia and, if a plebiscite were carried out, the whole of the population would be on the Saudi side. Mr. Dulles said that, according to his knowledge, the British did not like to claim anything by force and that the claims of the British were based on certain documents which they were ready to present to a neutral party for study. Prince Saud replied that, on the contrary, all the British had done in the area under discussion was to take forceful measures, even resorting to terrorism; and he said he believed that the American Ambassador had described these actions. The British had stopped food supplies to his people, thus killing his people by starvation, and they had even killed innocent people, he said. Mr. Dulles replied that he understood the King was exchanging communications with Mr. Churchill. The Prince said this was true but that the British were trying to dictate to Saudi Arabia, particularly when they knew that the friends of Saudi Arabia (the Americans) had deserted them. Mr. Dulles said it was not true to say that the Americans had deserted Saudi Arabia, and that any group that presented a claim supported by certain documents, expressing at the same time their willingness for neutral consideration of the facts, was not planning to resort to forceful measures. Prince Saud said treatment of the documents which were in the hands of the British constituted forceful action: violation of agreements and cancellation of a bilateral agreement, the cancellation being by consent of the British only. He referred to an agreement signed in Riyadh by Saudi Arabia and the British and pointed out that Saudi Arabia had accepted the British point of view in refusing the suggestion for a plebiscite and had accepted the British proposal for arbitration. They had done so under pressure from the British, at the same time expressing their willingness to strive for a peaceful solution. But in spite of all that, continued the Crown Prince, the British insisted and continued to insist on forceful measures. So how, he asked, could the dispute be settled in such an atmosphere?

Mr. Dulles said he would like to remind Prince Saud again that it was not true to say the U.S. had deserted Saudi Arabia. Prince Saud did not know of the endeavors America had made and the influence used with the British in attempting to reach a peaceful solution, he continued. It was his understanding, he said, that the King had submitted to the British a strong suggestion for solution of the dispute; and he reiterated that the U.S. would continue to use her influence to bring about an acceptable settlement. Prince Saud said all he wanted was to obtain a peaceful result, but the British would never hesitate to continue use of aggressive action. Mr. Dulles inquired what His Highness would suggest the U.S. do? Prince Saud replied all he wanted was that America use her influence with the British to stop their aggressive action, withdraw their forces, discontinue the siege of the country, and stop terrorism in order that the dispute could be solved in a friendly atmosphere. Supposing that America requested the British to do these things but that the British would not comply, what should we do then? Mr. Dulles inquired. Prince Saud ignored the question and said in view of the considerations discussed, it was requested that the U.S. live up to her promises and obligations. If the British were claiming that they are defending the Buraimi area on the basis of a request from the Sultan of Muscat (on the basis of an agreement concluded between them and the Sultan), continued the Crown Prince, Saudi Arabia expected at least that America would fulfill its promises and stop British aggression against Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Dulles said he would not like to miss this chance to comment and state that America had not failed in her obligation, because she had used influence with the British. President Truman's letter stated that any aggression against Saudi Arabia would be of concern to the U.S., he continued, and this was the fact. The existing dispute was of concern to the U.S. at this time. However, the letter did not say that America had to engage in war with Britain under the circumstances of such aggression as Saudi Arabia claimed. Mr.

Dulles asked Prince Saud to tell him frankly whether it was in the interest of America and Saudi Arabia that America engage in war with Britain? The Crown Prince replied by asking whether it was in the interest of America that the British take aggressive action against Saudi Arabia? Mr. Dulles said no. Prince Saud then asked what the solution would be in case of such aggression? Mr. Dulles said if His Highness were to go on a tour around the world, he would learn that there were about 25 cases like Buraimi. All were boundary disputes. If these cases were to be determined by war, he continued, then the result would be that the world would be destroyed. The Crown Prince then asked Mr. Dulles what course Saudi Arabia should follow in order to maintain her rights and honor? Mr. Dulles replied that such disputes could be settled by legal arbitration. At the same time, there must be a stand-still policy in order that neither of the two groups would take advantage of the other during the period of arbitration. He added that the U.S. was directing its policy toward this aim. Prince Saud said this was an acceptable idea, and that Saudi Arabia was ready, in case it were proved that she was using forceful measures to stop such measures. But if the other side were using such forceful measures, they must be stopped. Mr. Dulles said that according to his information, the British were not using such aggressive measures. He went on to say that this was not the only case in which the U.S. had this difference of views with Britain, and the United States could not be sure the British would accept suggestions. In the House of Commons there was criticism of American policy. Prince Saud inquired what the attitude of the U.S. would be if the British refused a suggestion? Mr. Dulles replied that, in such a case, the U.S. should not enter into a war against the British; a war with Britain would be a great catastrophe. The Prince said he did not want a war with Britain, all he wanted was that the U.S. stop Britain from aggressive action. Mr. Dulles said he believed there was still a chance to settle this problem by cordial and peaceful means, and he would not fail to exert his efforts to bring about a friendly solution. He added that he would continue to study the matter and report on it to his Government, and that at the same time he would continue his efforts with the British to effect a peaceful solution.

The Crown Prince inquired what the U.S. attitude would be if the British persisted in their aggressive attitude? Mr. Dulles replied that was a question he could not answer, because according to the U.S. Constitution, in order to engage in war Congress must make the decision; and he could not make any promises. At the same time, he pointed out, President Truman's letter only stated that in case any aggressive action were taken against Saudi Arabia, it would be of concern to the U.S. Prince Saud then inquired what the attitude of the U.S. would be if a war were started against Saudi Arabia? Mr. Dulles replied that he could do nothing without the approval of Congress. He did not expect war by Britain against Saudi Arabia, Mr. Dulles remarked, but in case there were any aggressive action by any enemy against Saudi Arabia, he would present the whole matter to Congress. At the same time, in a case of aggressive action, Saudi Arabia could submit her case to the UN. Prince Saud said he frankly believed that this matter was so tremendously important to Saudi Arabia and the existing situation so dangerous, that these replies were pushing his government to find some other way by which it could maintain its interests. As far as the UN was concerned, he believed the UN had not yet been able to solve its problems. Mr. Dulles said he would like to reassure His Highness that the U.S. was acting with a spirit of friendly ties, especially with Saudi Arabia. It was of mutual interest, he continued, that the activities and endeavors which the U.S. had made not be disclosed lest such disclosure create further reaction from Mr. Churchill. If His Highness could see what had been done and what was being done, he would believe that the U.S. had exerted a real effort for the sake of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The Crown Prince inquired what the result of this effort was in influencing the British? Mr. Dulles replied by stating that he believed up until now the matter was not yet finished.

The Crown Prince said he had expressed himself frankly because he wanted to know clearly the attitude of the U.S. and because he was responsible for his people. Mr. Dulles replied that he had answered with great frankness and that he had nothing to add and nothing to hide, except to say that up until now the U.S. had not disclosed the extent of her efforts and he could not now obligate himself to anything.

Prince Saud said now that he had explained everything, Mr. Dulles might wish to submit the matter to the President, which would give him a chance to submit it to his government; and he would wait for a reply. Mr. Dulles said this situation was very critical and was similar to that in Egypt, although there were no obligations toward Egypt as there were toward Saudi Arabia. He was trying to reach a solution to this dispute, with the understanding that Mr. Churchill was a difficult man to deal with. The Crown Prince said a reasonable and strong man would always try to arrive at an acceptable result. Mr. Dulles said that was true if the man were dealing with a person like His Highness or himself.

Mr. Stassen stated that he knew Mr. Dulles was a man of experience and wisdom in dealing with such subjects and that he was now commencing his study of the subject from all angles in order to reach an acceptable solution. He believed, he said, that his friends in Saudi Arabia would not find in Mr. Dulles negative conclusions. He added that both of them were working for a President who was well known for his experience, foresight, wisdom and special friendly feeling for Saudi Arabia. Mr. Stassen concluded by thanking His Highness for giving him a chance to express his comments. Prince Saud said he was placing great hope on this study, on Mr. Dulles' wisdom and experience, and on the belief that Mr. Dulles was not deserting his friends. Mr. Dulles replied that after such a day, which was crowded by all these meetings and work which would resume tomorrow, he believed this meeting and these talks were fruitful. The Crown Prince said it was Saudi Arabia's great hope to come to good results. Mr. Dulles added that at the same time he hoped that the Saudis would continue discussions with the British, and he said he would push the British to come to an acceptable and reasonable solution.

Summary

Mr. Dulles opened the conversation by stating that although this was a short trip, it had been a very fruitful and useful one. He had been able, after talking with His Majesty and Crown Prince Saud, to formulate some ideas about the problem the Saudis had on their hands. Mr. Dulles added that the U.S. had been of help in the past, and he hoped she would be of great help in the future.

Prince Faisal replied that he and his government were pleased to have Mr. Dulles, Mr. Stassen and their group here personally, so that the Americans could listen with their own ears to the subject which he discussed with the Secretary in Washington and so that they could appreciate the feeling of His Majesty in connection with this matter, which had reached a degree that surpassed his feeling about all other matters existing between the Saudis and the Americans. Prince Faisal said he did not wish to reiterate what all of them had heard last night; what was important now was to find a way to reach a satisfactory solution in this matter, either through the reports from the American Ambassador in Jidda or from the Saudi Arabian Ambassador in Washington. Prince Faisal said he did not know whether Mr. Dulles would like to see the texts of the communications exchanged with Mr. Churchill in connection with the matter?

Ambassador Hare asked if such documents were available here? Prince Faisal said yes, and he believed that seeing the texts personally might furnish greater explanation to those present. Mr. Hare said it was his understanding that the treaties between the British and the Sheikhdoms did not delineate the frontier; they concerned only the relations between Britain and these Sheikhdoms. The Ambassador said he understood also that the treaties concluded between the King and the British did not delineate the boundary, and that the boundary problem was supposed to be studied later on. Prince Faisal replied that he believed that when these treaties were concluded there was not a single thought that there would be even a single dispute about boundaries. All that was considered was that the treaties between Britain and these Sheikhdoms would be respected. Ambassador Hare remarked that the boundary problem, therefore, was still hanging. Prince Faisal said despite the fact that the boundary problem was not discussed at that time, the Saudis had been and still were exercising their jurisdiction in the area; and since 1934/5 the boundary problem had been discussed, but nevertheless nothing was discussed about the Buraimi dispute. He added that when he was in London he requested the British to have the Sheikhs concerned attend the Damman Conference, [2] but that the British only brought in the Sheikhs of Qatar and Abu Dhabi; the Sultan of Muscat was not brought in. This was clear evidence, he said, that the Buraimi problem was not a question of dispute with the British. Prince Faisal said also that the question of the frontier between Saudi Arabia, Qatar, and the Sheikhdom of Abu Dhabi was a subject of discussion. But, he said, we have never heard any mention about the Buraimi dispute.

Mr. Dulles said that for some time the U.S. had used its good office with Britain in order to reach an amicable and honorable solution; and he believed that after this visit, during which he had collected a lot of information, the U.S. could do more. Prince Faisal said he had explained and shown to him the documents and communications exchanged with Mr. Churchill and that Mr. Dulles had, of course, gotten a good idea about the situation now. He may have gathered that the Saudis desired to reach a solution with the British because it was the Saudi policy to maintain peace. But, he continued, with great regret there was no echo or any positive attitude on the part of the British. They asserted peaceful measures, but they had and were still committing forceful measures in the area. He would not put himself in the position of reciprocating such forceful acts as those committed by the British. At the same time, although Saudi Arabia was not of the same power as Britain, she would be able to create some trouble for Britain in that area, disregarding the ultimate results. He said the desire to maintain stability had motivated the Saudis to control themselves, but, of course, there would be an end to such self control. All he wanted from the U.S. was that she put an end to this disturbing action committed by the British, in such a manner that the result would not be displeasing to Saudi Arabia, to the U.S., or to the British themselves.

As an afterthought, Prince Faisal added that he had received a telegram that day from the Amir in Buraimi, Turki Bin Itaishan, in which it was stated that the camels which were being used for milk and flesh had been confiscated by a British patrol. This, said the Prince, was one of the annoying acts which the British were committing in that area, disregading the fact of Mr. Dulles' presence in Saudi Arabia. Mr. Dulles said that he noticed from the Churchill letter that Churchill would permit Bin Itaishan to get his food supply from the local market in Buraimi. Prince Faisal replied that such permission by Mr. Churchill was supposed to be effective at the time the arbitration committee would be performing its duties. But what, asked the Prince, would be the situation between now and then? And particularly, what would be the situation in connection with the population of Buraimi itself? How, he asked, could they get their food supplies if the British are besieging and blockading the area? Prince Faisal said, he was sorry the British were creating these problems at this time, when the whole world was in need of order and stability. They were creating such problems in connection with a simple matter which was of no importance. Of what interest would it be to Britain if the whole of the area of Buraimi were stricken from the map, he asked? What would be the advantage to Britain in clinging to Buraimi, or the harm to Britain if she forgot about Buraimi? He added that he could not understand this British policy. While Britain was trying to force America to accept certain demands regarding communist danger on the basis that such acceptance might help stability in the world, he said, she was at the same time creating in other parts of the world certain problems which would not help in maintaining stability. Prince Faisal said he believed that if Mr. Dulles had any suggestion or any idea about solving this problem, his government would be ready to adopt it. Mr. Dulles replied that he would get in touch with the British in this connection and let him know. Prince Faisal said there were certain points that he would like cleared up, so that they might be used in reaching an amicable solution: (1) The British must execute their commitments under the London agreement and the stand-still agreement. (2) Saudi Arabia must be on equal footing with Britain in that area until this problem had been solved. (3) This problem must be solved in accordance with what was agreed upon with the British Ambassador (he referred to a joint statement lately made by Saudi Arabia and the British Ambassador in Riyadh).

Mr. Dulles said he believed that Saudi Arabia, in accepting the principle of arbitration, was following an important and helpful approach. Prince Faisal said he was pleased to know this willingness and desire to come to a peaceful solution by accepting the principle of arbitration was appreciated. He was motivated, he continued, by the desire to maintain stability and friendship with Saudi Arabia's friends. Mr. Dulles said this was very important. Prince Faisal then remarked that the Buraimi problem did not need any more explanation.

Introducing a new subject, Prince Faisal said it was fortunate that there were certain points concerning the Saudi Kingdom and the U.S. which did not concern Britain. Sheikh Yussef added that Prince Faisal was referring to the military aid which Saudi Arabia would like to continue. Part of this military equipment had already arrived in Saudi Arabia, he said, but according to the information received, some of it was not in good condition. Saudi Arabia was interested, he continued, in accordance with what had been agreed upon, to receive good military equipment. Sheikh Yussef said that some of the armored cars had only traveled about 50 km and then stopped.

Prince Faisal said that when he was in Washington [3] Mr. Smith told him there were certain arrangements to be made, and that there was a projected agreement to be sent to Ambassador Hare for discussion with the Saudi Arabian Government. Sheikh Yussef said that Ambassador Hare had already told them about it, but that they had not yet received anything.

[3] For documentation, see Documents 242 ff.

Mr. Stassen stated that the U.S. was in the process of preparing the 1954 aid program for presentation to Congress, and he added that he believed President Eisenhower had told Prince Faisal that he had found Saudi Arabia eligible for grant aid, and that part of the present trip was to study the whole situation in connection with granting military aid to Saudi Arabia. Mr. Stassen said that when such information had been placed in the hands of President Eisenhower, action would be taken in the light of further reports which would be received from Ambassador Hare in connection with military equipment sent to Saudi Arabia. The whole subject, Mr. Stassen continued, would be studied from every angle and would then be presented to President Eisenhower. He said he believed that the recommendations which would be submitted in connection with the military aid program under the Mutual Security Act would parallel the policy of the Secretary of State. When a decision had been reached, it would be submitted to His Majesty's government. Mr. Stassen added that he believed that after this step had been taken by the group on this visit, the discussion of this subject would be satisfactory and it would be reported either through the American Ambassador in Jidda or the Saudi Arabian Ambassador in Washington.

Prince Faisal said Mr. Smith told him while in Washington that President Eisenhower had decided to grant to Saudi Arabia special aid apart from that offered the Middle East in general and that the program of this aid would be sent to Ambassador Hare to be presented to the Saudi Arabian Kingdom after such program had been processed by Congress. Mr. Smith, related the Prince, said that in this program which was being submitted to Congress for 1954 there was aid for the Middle East. As part of this program, there would be an arrangement for the defense of the area against the communist danger.

Mr. Dulles said there were two points in approaching the question of military aid: (1) The general view which is based on aid for the whole area and which requires an understanding among the states of the Middle East area of their responsibility in its defense. (2) The approach to each country separately. Under this approach Saudi Arabia had been one of the countries found eligible for such aid. Saudi Arabia would be included in the general aid or the separate aid. Mr. Dulles desired the Saudi Arabian Government to understand that the American Department of Defense was anxious that this military equipment would be used in the best possible way, due to the fact that there were great and unlimited demands for military equipment at the present time. It was very difficult to estimate the demands which were submitted to the U.S. for military equipment. In addition to this fact, there was an actual war in Korea which was consuming great quantities of military equipment and ammunition, either for the American forces, the Southern Korean forces, or the UN forces.

If the war were stopped, this would reduce the demands for military equipment; but events did not prove that the war was going to be stopped. If the truce negotiations failed, the U.S. might have to double her military efforts, and as a result there would be an increased demand for military equipment. There were also the forces in Formosa. The new Administration had learned that the people in Formosa had been promised certain military equipment by President Truman but that only 30 per cent had been recognized. There was also the war in Indo China which required military equipment. When the last invasion was carried on in Laos, the U.S. sent more equipment to the people fighting there. At the same time, the U.S. was responding to demands for more military equipment from the members of the Atlantic Charter, such as Norway which was threatened by Communism. There was also a demand for military equipment from Turkey and her allies. In giving these explanations to the Saudi Arabian Government, Mr. Dulles said, it did not mean that the U.S. would not be able to help Saudi Arabia, but it meant merely that the U.S. had certain pressures for military equipment. The military experts had the last word as to which area should be offered preference for military equipment.

Mr. Dulles said it was evident that there was desire for collective defense in this area and that supplying military equipment for collective defense in this area was easier than supplying each country separately. He also believed, he said, that the program for the Middle East defense as it had been submitted did not mean that it must be accepted in the way it was presented. The whole aim of the project was to defend the area. It was up to the states of the area to come to an understanding on the way of defending the Middle East. In fact, the United States was motivated by the desire to unite the different, small states in order that they could defend themselves collectively. The Communist threat which we were facing now was also a result of a unity of different states like Czechoslovakia, Poland, etc.; but the difference was that these states were united by force. Nevertheless, they formed one-third of the whole population of the world. Such unity had to be faced, but the U.S. did not like to form her unity in the way the Communists had formed theirs. The U.S. would prefer that such unity be formed by means of understanding and satisfaction. Of course, this did not mean that the U.S. would request the free states to form a collective security solely to face the Communist threat. Such cooperation included all mutual matters to defend the country. And as far as the integrity of these countries was concerned, Mr. Dulles said, it must be maintained. America therefore hoped that such collective cooperation for defending the area would be increased, and America did not state, as a condition for offering arms to these countries, that they must accept the idea of a defense project. However, any collective cooperation among these states would help in complying with the demands for military equipment.

Prince Faisal said he was greatly appreciative of Mr. Dulles' explanation, and Saudi Arabia recognized the responsibilities which were assumed by the United States. As to what Mr. Dulles had stated in connection with collective cooperation, the Arab League had lately decided to execute the Collective Security Pact.

Mr. Dulles said there was a point which he would like to refer to as evidence of cooperation. This point was the useful cooperation between the Saudi Arabian Government and Aramco. It might be that there were certain impressions given during the recent political campaign that the United States was not pleased with the relationship existing between Aramco and Saudi Arabia, but this was merely a domestic question which had to do with the political campaign. The U.S. was in fact very pleased and happy over the friendly relations and cooperation existing between Aramco and Saudi Arabia, and was also appreciative of the facilities offered at Dhahran Air Field. As a result of these points; the U.S. felt that the Government of Saudi Arabia was actually participating in mutual security activities, and Saudi Arabia's cooperation in this field was appreciated.

If the U.S. gave any preference to any state by means of grant aid, Mr. Dulles said, it did not mean that she was basing her claim on regional worthiness but on the strategic requirements of that country. The U.S. always took into consideration the situation of that country and the circumstances in existence. In fact, there was only one division now in America while there were six in Germany and two in Japan. Mr. Dulles said he believed that defense of the United States must be made outside the United States, and this was why we were distributing U.S. forces. It was his desire, he said, that the King and His Highness understand that military aid was only offered on the basis of the military recommendation and not on the regional basis. If it were to be granted on the regional situation, the U.S. would have brought all her forces into the United States. The U.S. was also preparing defense of the United States alone, but she was preparing for the United States' friends too. Mr. Dulles reiterated that His Highness must not get the idea that the U.S. was not ready to give military aid to Saudi Arabia.

Prince Faisal replied that it was a pleasure to hear from Mr. Dulles an expression of appreciation for cooperation given by His Majesty's Government, which was considered as actual participation in mutual security activities. This at least would give the feeling that Saudi Arabia and the U.S. were real friends and would give the Saudis the right to request from her friend what she needed. But, of course, Prince Faisal added, America could not send all of her forces all over the world; and America had to gain strong friends who would be on her side and would be able to defend themselves; and in that case the United States had to offer military aid to these friends. This would save the United States the trouble of sending its forces abroad. Any collective cooperation in any area must be homogenous, he continued. This was why he desired to settle the whole problem of the Arab countries and to solve them, in order that there would be a very good atmosphere suitable for automatic cooperation among these countries for collective defense. He was sure that Mr. Dulles and his group had touched personally during their visits the situation existing in the Arab countries, and that they had felt the extent of the effect of these problems. For example, they had had an idea of the Egyptian problems, and they had understood them clearly. He personally had invited the British not to repeat the story of Iran and Egypt. He believed that the situation existing in Iran now was a result of the unwise policy followed by the British. One must not forget that there was also the question of the Arabs of Palestine, which, of course, needed an immediate solution. This was just a bleeding wound and he did not want to enter into any details about the subject because it was well understood by Mr. Dulles and the United States Government. There was also the problem of the Arabs in North Africa and the terrorism spread over it by the French people. He believed that this question, if not worse than any other problem, was at least equal. The people were living in very bad conditions, but, he said, he believed that the U.S. had more information about it than Saudi Arabia had. Prince Faisal added that this was generally what the Saudis had in mind in addition to her major problem, which was the Saudi-British dispute. Mr. Dulles answered that he appreciated greatly all the points mentioned by Prince Faisal.

Mr. Stassen stated that he was personally interested in the military equipment sent by the United States to Saudi Arabia. He added that if there were anything wrong with it, a report should be made to the United States Government through the American Ambassador.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State [1]

SECRET NEW DEHLI, May 21, 1953—11:30 a. m.

ST D-8

Subject: India

Participants: Prime Minister Nehru
Secretary Dulles

1. Mr. Nehru emphasized India's need to create internal unity. There was danger that the country might fall apart. Independence had brought many exaggerated hopes, and it was easy to arouse discontent. That is why India concentrates upon its own internal economy and such topics as the Five Year Plan. India cannot risk renewed starvation.

2. India has almost no contacts, economic or political, with the Government of Soviet Russia. The contacts of the Indian Communist Party are largely via England rather than direct. The Indian Communist Party originally treated the Chinese Communists as "deviationists" and only within the last two years changed their attitude under instructions from Moscow. The Indian Communists had made alliances which gave them considerable political success in certain areas, but their political allies are tending to separate from them.

3. China, like Soviet Russia, is going through an expansionist phase. This is not wholly due to Communist rule. The Communists are accepted as rulers, because they provide a measure of internal order, but most of the Chinese are not themselves Communists. Almost assuredly Communist China will divorce itself from Soviet Russia within 15 or 25 years. Already the ties are weakened by the death of Stalin. The Soviet Union, while pretending to want the admission of Communist China to the United Nations, does not want this in reality because it wants to keep China dependent upon the Soviet Union as its spokesman. The material dependence of Communist China on Russia has increased during the last two years largely because of the Korean War. Probably China would want to build up itself economically before engaging in any major aggression.

4. India has a two thousand-mile frontier with China and has a deep concern with its relation with China. India has proclaimed that the Himalayas are its frontier and that it will not tolerate a penetration to the south. This has particular reference to Nepal. India still maintains approximately 250 troops in Tibet with the acquiescence of the Chinese government. India does not particularly fear aggression via Burma. The Chinese could easily penetrate into Burma but they could not easily move on into India. It does not appear that the Chinese now have any aggressive designs against Burma, otherwise they would have taken advantage of the presence in Burma of the Chinese Nationalist troops which gave them a ready pretext.

5. Indo-China is an area where Indian and Chinese influences have always converged. Mr. Nehru thinks that the fighting in Indo-China is more of a native than of a Chinese Communist origin. He seemed rather unconcerned about the fate of Siam, stating that Siam had always had an unstable government.

6. Mr. Nehru feels that a high-level conference of world leaders would serve a useful purpose and a beginning of relaxation of tension, but feels that this should not occur prior to a Korean armistice and perhaps the conclusion of an Austrian treaty which he said should be quickly obtainable. Mr. Nehru feels that the new generation of Russians is more interested in economic improvement than in expansion. Thus he believes that recent changes of tactics by Soviet leaders may have more than superficial significance.

7. Mr. Nehru spoke of the importance of disarmament. I stated the President had already taken action which could, if the Soviet responded, end the so-called armament race. He had cut Truman's defense budget on theory of having a military establishment compatible with economic health rather than based on arms to match the Soviet military establishment. If the Soviet would cut its military budget in accordance with the same principle applying more of its economic productivity to the welfare of the people and less to armament then a start to reverse the present trend would have been made and this might be more productive than the disarmament conference which had almost assuredly bogged down in attempting an impossible task of trying to evaluate mechanistically the various military potentials.

8. We discussed the Korean armistice. I stated that our latest proposal contemplated the exclusive use of Indian troops to take custody of prisoners not desiring to be repatriated and that I hoped that India would accept this responsibility. Mr. Nehru indicated acquiescence. Mr. Nehru urged the importance of concluding an armistice, stating that he feared otherwise the fighting would extend. I agreed with his estimate. stating that if the armistice negotiations collapsed, the United States would probably make a stronger rather than a lesser military exertion, and that this might well extend the area of conflict. (Note: I assumed this would be relayed.) I said that we were, however, sincerely trying to get an armistice and that only crazy people could think that the United States wanted to prolong the struggle, which had already cost us about 150,000 casualties and 10 to 15 billion dollars of expenditures. Mr. Nehru said that he completely accepted the proposition that we wanted an armistice and not to prolong the war. I said that the problem of dealing with the Republic of Korea was one which apparently most people overlooked. It could not be overlooked because the ROK had a moral interest and also a material position which could not be ignored. If in disgust their troops stopped fighting, that could presage not an armistice but a great military disaster for the United States forces there. Also if they decided to go on fighting, there could be no armistice. That is why we had introduced the proposal for an immediate freeing of the North Koreans who did not want to be repatriated. This was strongly desired by President Rhee, and would make the armistice more acceptable. In fact the North Koreans had already acted in this same way as regards South Korean POWs. We were, however, still striving to find an acceptable armistice formula. We could not, however, abandon the concept of political asylum. That was something in which President Eisenhower and the American people believed strongly. Perhaps in this matter we were idealistic, but the one thing for which Americans had been willing to fight and die was their ideals. We did not apologize for this.

9. It was agreed to meet again the next day to complete the discussion of other items.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the Embassy in India [1]

SECRET
NEW DELHI, May 21, 1953—5 p. m.

ST D-8/1

Subject: India

[1] This conversation took place at the Office of the Prime Minister.

Participants: Prime Minister Nehru
Mr. Byroade

Mr. Stassen, accompanied by Mr. Byroade, called upon Prime Minister Nehru in his office at 5 o'clock on May 21. The conversation was devoted primarily to discussion of India's internal economic problem, with primary emphasis upon India's Five Year Plan. The Prime Minister lead off with a remark that the necessary work inside India was so great that it was with some reluctance that they were distracted from their task of reconstruction internally by the necessary consideration of foreign problems. He traced the rather remarkable transition which India had gone through at the time of her independence and talked of the problem of consolidating the approximately 600 states of India into one united nation.

Mr. Nehru talked at some length about road-building projects upon which people had volunteered their labor and upon the community development work which was under way in India. He felt a great response from the people of India to the efforts being made to improve their lot. It has reached a point, he said, where people actually clamoring for development projects within their home areas, and it was impossible to make rapid enough progress to really satisfy the under-privileged people. He said there had been a question as to whether a few really large works should be put under way or a far greater number of smaller projects. He had decided upon the latter approach while not abandoning continued progress on the larger ones.

In response to Nehru's invitation, Stassen commented upon what he thought was a major planning task facing the Indian planners. They were at the moment completely engrossed in trying to finish the Five Year Plan He felt that a continuation of that plan entirely along the lines now envisaged might produce an imbalance between agricultural development and industrial development and that more thought should probably be given to raising the consumption level through industrial development.

The Prime Minister agreed completely with Mr. Stassen's thesis and there followed considerable discussion on the difficulty of keeping these two phases in balance.

Mr. Byroade stated that those in the Department working on problems in this area were greatly encouraged by the spirit and determination shown in India's Five Year Plan. He stated that throughout the whole area of Africa and the Middle East so often there is a lack of determined leadership in the tremendously difficult problem of development to improve the lot of the people. He stated that we saw in India a determination to accomplish a task entirely on her own if necessary and that was producing a good response at home. We realize therefore that any help that we might be able to give would be merely to allow the Indians themselves to make faster progress.

Mr. Stassen informed Nehru of our desire to approach the question of aid on a longer term basis than the previous one-year approach and that he had already developed a theme before Congress of the necessity of looking forward to a program of three years duration. It was understood of course that funds would be voted on a yearly basis, but he believed that President Eisenhower, with his present prestige, could reach an informal understanding with Congress upon the longer term approach. Stassen also indicated that a great study was under way in the United States to determine what our trade policy would be and to modernize that policy so that it was consistent with our tremendous responsibility.

SECRET NEW DELHI, May 22, 1953—1 p. m.
ST D-8/2

Subject: India

Participants: Prime Minister Nehru
Secretary Dulles

1. We discussed Egyptian situation. I gave a detailed report of the situation as I found it and the lines of possible solution. Mr. Nehru expressed great concern over the possibility that undeclared war might break out with a possible British reoccupation of Cairo and Alexandria. He said, of course, the British can do this, but what will they do next: "bayonets are no good to sit on." He inquired as to the relationship of the proposed Egypt base agreement to a collective security organization. I indicated the importance of assuring the creation of such a collective security organization with at least some form of UK and US associate membership so that before the British technicians were out of the base it would assume an international status with availability to the US and UK. I emphasized that this was the only real power area in the whole region and that it served far more than the Suez Canal.

2. Mr. Nehru brought up the subject of the Korean armistice, referring particularly to my statement of the preceding day, that if there was no armistice hostilities might become more intense. He said that if this happened it would be difficult to know what the end might be. He urged withdrawal of our armistice proposals inconsistent with the Indian resolutions, notably the provision regarding Korean POWs and unanimity. He agreed that there should be some provision for ultimate freeing of the POWs not desiring to be repatriated, stating that it would be an "impossible situation," for them to rot away with no end to their incarceration. I said that our formula was designed to meet that situation plus the likelihood that the communists would not accept the Indian resolution that future of POWs be referred finally to UN Assembly. Nehru agreed that this would probably be inacceptable because of communist China's absence from the UN. He made no alternate proposal. He brought up again my reference to intensified operations, but I made no comment and allowed the topic to drop.

3. Nehru brought up the problem of Africa, stating that unless Colonial powers adopted a more liberal policy he believed the whole continent would be lost through violent revolution. He described in some detail the Mau Mau situation, and said that this was typical of what might become a rather general situation. We then went on to discuss generally the colonial problem. I said that the US was faithful to its traditions in these matters and would like nothing better than to work openly for political liberty, but that we did not feel that we could afford an open break with the British and French in this matter. He agreed that an open break should be avoided but hoped that our influence would continue to be exerted, in favor of nationalism, saying that if communism had monopoly of that issue they would surely win in Africa and Asia. We discussed the Laos situation which Nehru considered to be a local rebellion but which I said, according to our information, was pure aggression from without. Mr. Nehru raised in this connection the role of a nephew of the Prime Minister of Laos, who he said was leading the invasion. I said we apparently had conflicting intelligence.

4. I brought up the problem of Kashmir,[2] and I said I was glad to know that Nehru intended to deal with this directly with the Prime Minister of Pakistan. I suggested that partition might be a better solution than a plebiscite. Nehru indicated agreement and recalled that at some earlier time he had proposed to Pakistan a settlement on the basis of the status quo. He indicated he might renew this proposal in London.

5. I referred to reported Indian concern over Pakistan as a member of MEDO. I said it seemed to me unlikely that MEDO as originally projected would come into being at an early date and that the US had no present plans that would bring it into a military relationship with Pakistan which could reasonably be looked upon as unneutral as regards India. Mr. Nehru expressed satisfaction at this declaration.

6. I reported to Nehru in some detail the conflict between King Ibn Said and the British regarding the area of British protectorate particularly around Buraimi. I suggested that this might come up at their Commonwealth meeting and that I would like him to be informed of the King's attitude and of his effort to bring us into the situation, adversely to the UK.

Note: The entire conversation was extremely cordial and frank.

Secretary of State Dulles	Mr. Mohammed Ali, Prime Minister of Pakistan
Mr. Harold E. Stassen	Mr. Aziz Ahmed, Cabinet Secretary
Ambassador Horace A. Hildreth
Mr. Henry A. Byroade
Mr. Douglas MacArthur II
Mr. John K. Emmerson
Lt. Col. Stephen J. Meade

The Secretary referred to the countries he had visited on his trip, particularly to Egypt, and expressed the hope that the issue between Egypt and the UK would be solved. He referred to the Prime Minister's forthcoming visit to London and to the Commonwealth talks that would take place after the coronation. He expressed the hope that the Prime Minister would be able to exert his influence toward a settlement of this problem.

The Prime Minister stated that the four problems affecting this area were (1) the Egyptian situation, (2) the problem of Israel and the Arab states, (3) the Anglo-Iranian oil problem and (4) the issues between India and Pakistan.

The Secretary referred to his recent talks with Nehru and said he hoped some solution could be arrived at through the discussions to take place between the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan. Mr. Mohammed Ali said that "a gesture must come from Nehru" and that pressure must be brought to bear on Nehru to achieve a solution. He said that the United States must "keep the heat on both of us".

Mr. Dulles stated that he made clear to Nehru the deep concern of the United States in the problem. With respect to pressure, it is obvious that any action to relate economic aid to the political actions of another country would be resented. The Prime Minister agreed with this point of view. The Secretary said he had told Nehru that it was difficult for the U.S. to justify before Congress the giving of economic aid when the economies of both India and Pakistan were being dragged down by the maintenance of military establishments made necessary by the possibility of hostilities over Kashmir.

The Prime Minister noted that because of the Kashmir dispute, foreign capital was reluctant to come in to participate in the development of the country.

The Secretary, commenting that there was an impression that the desire to settle the problem of Kashmir was stronger on the part of Pakistan than India, inquired whether partition was a possible solution. The Prime Minister replied that partition had been thought of but that it was no settlement since it would involve "selling the birthright of the people". The Secretary commented that reliance on the will of the people was a noble principle but that it was sometimes difficult to carry out a plebiscite which frequently would occur in an atmosphere of mistrust with opportunities to whip up violent emotions on both sides.

To the Prime Minister's comment that a calm atmosphere could be assured under the auspices of a neutral organization, the Secretary replied "you are optimistic about that". Mr. Dulles recalled that the record on the Sarr plebiscite was pretty bad. Certainly there could be no objection to the theory and principle of a plebiscite but in practice it frequently did not work out. To us, the way the question is resolved is less important than that the problem should be settled. Certainly the United States does not want to interfere in the internal affairs of other nations. Nevertheless we are deeply concerned in this matter.

The Prime Minister expressed the opinion that the way to settle the issue was important and that there were three parties directly concerned; namely, India, Pakistan and the people of Kashmir. One was apt to lose sight of the interests of the people themselves and of the fact that anything imposed contrary to the will of the people would produce constant frustration and trouble. They would resist foreign domination and "we have no right to make a settlement not acceptable to the Kashmiri people".

Mr. Dulles stated that most boundary disputes were settled by negotiations between the two claimants. The United States had experience in these matters. Examples were the disputes over our boundaries with Canada ("54-40 or fight") and with Mexico. People want a Government which will provide law and order and under which they can achieve their livelihood. The Prime Minister replied that the Kashmir question was more than a boundary dispute, that it represented a dispute over a very large territory. He said he was optimistic, that he believed a settlement could be reached, but that India had to play a more important part than it had thus far. The present position seemed to suit India. In Pakistan there was a small minority who believed that "we should take the matter in our own hands" and solve it by direct action. Fortunately this was a small group of fanatics but nevertheless it represented a real danger.

The Secretary expressed the opinion that a settlement in Kashmir would make the settlement of other problems much easier. The Prime Minister agreed, pointing out the economic interdependency of India and Pakistan and the fact that the economies of both countries had been disrupted because of this dispute.

The Secretary then turned to the food problem in Pakistan and referred to the recent visit of the wheat mission. The Prime Minister replied that he had "his fingers crossed" on this matter. He emphasized that the stability of the present Government depended on getting the necessary wheat from the United States. There was a two-fold need, one for wheat, and one for the financial help which would be represented by the proceeds from the sale of wheat. He said he dreaded to contemplate what would happen if the food problem could not be solved.

The Secretary stated that Mr. Stassen, the President and he himself were extremely sympathetic to Pakistan's position and that the interest of the Congress had been expressed by their sending a group here to make a study of the problem. The Executive Branch would do all it could to produce a favorable response. He was sure, however, that the Prime Minister would understand that the United States was going through a difficult period with respect to its budget and its financial position. He added that the fact that he and his party had been in Pakistan would help a great deal since they could testify first hand to the situation.

The Secetary mentioned that he believed there was a feeling of much greater friendship in the United States for Pakistan than India. The Prime Minister replied laughingly that there was such a great fund of friendship that he wished "he could draw a check on it". He said the Secretary probably knew that the rumor had been circulated that the United States was responsible for making him Prime Minister. He referred to his discussions with Mr. Emmerson on the conclusion of a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation and reiterated that while he wanted the treaty to be agreed upon as soon as possible, he felt that in view of the rumor that the United States controlled him, a postponement of final action would be desirable.

The Secretary referred to the question of a Middle East Defense Organization and inquired whether the Prime Minister had any views he wished to express on this matter. Mr. Mohammed Ali replied that he was waiting for the Secretary to express some views on MEDO. He said that Pakistan would welcome anything which assured the security of this area. He said he liked the idea and had hoped to hear details about it from the Secretary.

Mr. Dulles said he could give no details since the organization had not come into existence. He believed that a new approach to the problem was necessary, that there had not been a solid enough base within the area itself to build an effective organization. It was important that the members not be principally those who may have an interest in the area but are located outside the area such as the US, France, the UK, Australia and others. It was better to start with something more indigenous to the area and at least initially, countries strangers to the area should not participate. The Secretary referred to the importance of the Suez bases in the case of war as suppliers for all the countries of the area. He hoped that a settlement of the situation between Egypt and the UK would permit the development of some kind of an organization.

The Prime Minister remarked that there were three countries which stood as obstructions to Russian ambitions in this area. These were Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan and they stood between the Persian Gulf and the Soviet Union.

At this, Ambassador Hildreth noted that the Secretary had an appointment with the Foreign Minister and it it was decided to continue the discussion at 11:30 a. m., May 24.

CONFIDENTIAL KARACHI, May 23, 1953—2:15 p. m.

Participants: Mr. Mohammed Ali—Minister of Finance
Mr. Harold E. Stassen—DMS

At the Finance Minister's suggestion, and after a few brief comments by the Secretary of State in which he indicated to the Finance Minister that he would look to DMS for a report and in which DMS indicated that our decisions in these economic matters would be in accordance with the foreign policy of the Secretary of State, the Finance Minister and the Director for Mutual Security conferred at the Governor General's house from 2:15 to 3:15 P.M.

There were no unusual new facets of information or views that have not been previously well known.

1. He emphasized very urgent need for wheat, and expressed a need of one million tons and a 250 million ton reserve to properly manage his economy.

2. He described the land tenure developments, with rather favorable conclusions in East Bengal and Punjab, but the difficulties in making any progress in the Sind Province.

3. He spoke of his foreign exchange difficulties, his sharp loss from the fall of cotton and jute prices, his extreme difficulty in holding the minimum reserves behind his currency

4. He emphasized that revenues depended primarily on taxes on imports and exports and that he had no power of taxation over agricultural income, this being reserved for the provinces.

5. He expressed extreme interest in further industrialization and the desire of his Government to welcome private investment. He inquired whether some tax concession could be made in the United States to encourage U.S. private capital investment in underdeveloped countries such as Pakistan.

6. He confirmed that extreme economic advantage would result to both India and Pakistan if peace could be established between the two.

7. He expressed a belief in the existence of mineral deposits in Baluchistan and stated that Canadian geologists and technical assistance were being directed to a survey of that territory.

8. He reviewd the irrigation and water resource problems and plans.

9. He explained his strict import controls especially on consumer goods to maintain his minimum foreign exchange reserves and to permit some continuation of essential industrial imports and development imports.

10. He indicated the desire of his Government to have a U.S. expert as the chairman of the "Grow More Food" committee which they were organizing in Pakistan. He also expressed an interest in technical assistance for industrial and trade development to be utilized with economic assistance.

The Director for Mutual Security advised the Minister of Finance that the Secretary of State had expressed confidence that the United States would have a friendly interest in the economic success of Pakistan.

1. The Reed wheat report would likely be presented to the Congress in the near future and the results would depend upon the Congressional action.

2. In other respects, the 1954 Mutual Security Program would probably be acted upon by Congress in about two months, and within one month after that it should be possible to advise the Pakistan Government of the economic assistance program for Pakistan for the fiscal year 1954.

3. It was not possible to make commitments on either the wheat or the economic and technical assistance programs at this time.

4. The opportunity to meet and discuss these problems with the Finance Minister was appreciated.

5. The provision of the new Mutual Security Law for 1954 of a chapter for Mutual Development and Technical Progress program was explained to the Finance Minister.

6. Other questions raised by the Finance Minister would be considered in relationship to the future Mutual Security Program.

Mr. Harold E. Stassen
Ambassador Horace A. Hildreth
Mr. Henry A. Byroade

Lt. Col. Stephen J. Meade

There was some brief preliminary discussion of the Egyptian situation and of the forthcoming Commonwealth conference in London. The Foreign Minister referred to the Secretary's trip to the Middle East and to the good psychological effect it was having on the peoples and governments of the area. The Secretary said there was a danger that expectations might be raised too high because of his trip.

The Secretary then referred to the Kashmir situation and expressed the hope that the forthcoming talks between the two Prime Ministers would be fruitful. Sir Zafrulla said he hoped this would be the case. However, Pakistan's experience in the past was not too encouraging. Nevertheless one would never take the attitude that one should not try again. Preliminary talks would take place in London after which a series of meetings would presumably be held in Karachi and Delhi. These would probably begin toward the end of June or not later than the beginning of July.

The Foreign Minister stated that if there could be a settlement of the Kashmir question every other problem could be settled. Not only would a settlement of the Kashmir dispute produce a good atmosphere but Kashmir itself was half the canal water problem. Furthermore, after a settlement of Kashmir, the evacuee property problem could be solved automatically. Kashmir was 90% of the issues between India and Pakistan.

To a question from Mr. Byroade as to whether the Foreign Minister had more hope for a settlement at present than previously, Sir Zafrulla replied that his answer would be both no and yes: no, because he had received no indication that Nehru, who was more important as an individual than anybody else, now "really wanted to go forward"; yes, because the United States was beginning to take a little more interest in the problems. The Foreign Minister believed that if Nehru feels that the United States is taking an interest and that this interest is likely to be continuous, he might possibly exert efforts to find a solution.

The Secretary commented that he had indicated to Nehru the very great interest of the United States in this problem.

Sir Zafrulla stated that there were two things of importance with respect to Kashmir. The first was that an agreement must not be imposed. Pakistan had never asked that anything be imposed on the people of Kashmir and was willing to go along with what Nehru had telegraphed to the Pakistan Prime Minister on November 8, 1947. The substance of this telegram was as follows:

> "We have gone in for the purpose of restoring law and order. Once law and order are restored we shall withdraw our forces and then Pakistan and India should hold a plebiscite to find out what Kashmir desires."

The second point of importance was that the agreement already reached in the UN resolution should be carried out. India should be asked to carry out the obligations which she has accepted.

The Foreign Minister emphasized that Pakistan had never said that Kashmir must accede to Pakistan. Pakistan had said that the people of Kashmir should decide for themselves under conditions which guaranteed that the plebiscite would be free.

Dr. Byroade asked whether in addition to a solution based on the UN Resolutions, Pakistan would consider any other type of solution. Sir Zafrulla then described the efforts of Sir Owen Dixon, particularly his proposal of a conference to consider whether certain areas might immediately accede to India or Pakistan, according to whether they had Muslim or non-Muslim majorities, and that the remaining area should be the "plebiscite area." Pakistan at first did not favor this proposal but the Prime Minister, Liaquat Ali Khan, finally reluctantly agreed on condition that if no agreement resulted, the former agreements would stand. When Sir Owen Dixon informed Nehru of Pakistan's acceptance of this proposal, Nehru claimed he had never heard of it. Sir Girja Bajpai later attributed this statement of Nehru's to the fact he was "temporarily overtaken by factual amnesia."

The Foreign Minister stated that he had no hope that India would agree to such a solution in view of the fact that Dixon had tried and Nehru had refused.

The Foreign Minister assured his listeners that "he was talking from the heart" and stated that any fair proposal for the solution of Kashmir would be considered. He said that even if the non-Muslim areas were taken away, and a plebiscite were held in the valley, he would favor it. However, any plebiscite must be carried out in such a manner that unfair means would be impossible. He said that if such proposal came as part of a decision already taken and binding, he believed the Government would be willing to take the risk and face the country, provided of course that only those clearly non-Muslim territories were taken away and the plebiscite were fairly conducted under the UN.

Mr. Stassen asked whether it was possible to estimate the economic loss to the country because of the Kashmir dispute. Sir Zafrulla replied that the financial outlay was of course tremendous but that the actual loss was even greater. The dispute put both nations on the "qui vive," it had bedeviled the relations of the two countries with regard to other questions and it had stopped both countries from going ahead with constructive programs to develop the prosperity of the countries. He added that Kashmir was the place where the greatest possible progress could be made and that it had great possibilities for development. He agreed that a solution would bring great economic benefit to both Pakistan and India.

Mr. Byroade asked whether, assuming one could ignore the will of the people, agreement could be reached on total partition.

Sir Zafrulla replied that he did not know what he meant by ignoring the will of the people. What Mr. Byroade suggested seemed similar to the proposal made by General McNaughton in December 1948. According to this proposal, Ladakh would have gone to India.

Pakistan would have been agreeable to such a proposal. The Foreign Minister referred to the suggestion that the valley become independent. He said if people of the valley wished to commit suicide, Pakistan would not stand in the way. However, independence would be infeasible since the area would become an arena of international intrigue.

Sir Zafrulla concluded the discussion by saying it was axiomatic that unless Kashmir is settled so that India and Pakistan cease to be hostile and suspicious of each other's designs, there will be no peace in this part of the world.

Lt. Col. Stephen J. Meade	Governor General Ghulam Mohammed

At approximately 11:30 hours I was summoned by the Governor General to come to his Residence at once. Upon arriving I found that the urgency indicated was more of a personal nature, in that he had just learned that morning that I was a member of the Secretary's party and since we were "old friends" he wanted to take this opportunity to sit down and have a talk with me. Although the general tone of the conversation was personal in nature, the following salient points are worthy of note:

The GG expressed the same interest in obtaining economic aid that he had discussed with me during my visit in April this year, which I reported by cable requesting that such information be passed to State. He is anxious to obtain a loan of one hundred million dollars to help them get through the current economic crisis, such money to be used for rehabilitation, and advancement of economic projects in the country. (This is in addition to the request for the million tons of wheat.) He said that he does not desire this money in the form of a grant, but rather as a loan "from one friend to one that is in an unhappy economic circumstances for the moment." He feels that this can be repaid in approximately five years.

Regarding military aid, he is primarily interested in the acquisition of heavy artillery (by this I presume he means 155 MM and perhaps 8 inch), the establishment of maintenance services for aircraft, tanks and other items of general ordnance. At this juncture he said he knew what the reaction would be to such a request on the part of the American public, that they would have the suspicion that such equipment would be used against India. Again, as he has many times in the past, he promised that such military aid would not be used against India; further, that his Government would be willing to sign an agreement that Pakistan will go to the aid of India should that country be attacked.

The GG expressed the desire for liberty ships and tankers, the number of 20 being mentioned, which I presume would be total for both. In this connection, he expressed his concern about having little over 1 Division of troops in East Pakistan without logistical means of transporting elsewhere in the event of an emergency, India not permitting their passage through that country.

Regarding the settlement of the Kashmir dispute, the GG emphasized that we should display a continued and strong interest in the settlement in this question vis-à-vis Nehru; that such a display of interest on our part which to date has not been in evidence would, in his opinion, spur Nehru toward arbitration. As the situation now stands it is to India's advantage to delay a settlement, as it is only Pakistan which is suffering from the situation.

He again expressed his desire to visit the United States in August for a period of one week or ten days in Boston for a medical checkup followed by an "informal visit to Washington to visit some friends". (This I reported during my visit to Karachi in April.) He said that all he needed was some sort of an invitation from us. (I have taken this up with Mr. Byroade, and mentioned it to General Smith, who instructed me to tell the GG that he would be delighted to see him and have a small informal luncheon for him in Washington when he comes.)

He reiterated his firm stand against any form of Islamic Constitution and his desire to curb the Mullahs and their fanatical activities. He realizes that this is a thing of the past and that the country must turn toward the West, particularly the United States, with greater moderation regarding religion in Pakistan.

The Secretary opened the conversation by an inquiry as to the present state of the Pakistan Army. The General replied by explaining the difficulties encountered at the time of partition with many Pakistan troops being stationed at that time in Indian territory and the necessity in some cases of actually fighting their way back to Pakistan; how the majority of ordnance stocks and heavy equipment were grabbed by the Indians which posed a tremendous problem to the Pakistani Armed Forces. He related that how through their will power and determination they have since been able to improve this situation to the point where they now have a very efficient fighting force of approximately 250,000. He admitted that they were still wanting in heavy equipment, such as armor, heavy artillery and that their principal striking force is still found in the Infantry role. He said that they have about 7 Divisions of Infantry, 2 Brigades of Armor and other combat and service units. He expressed his gratification to the United States Government for sending 350 Sherman tanks mounting 76 MM guns as well as a number of M-36 tank destroyers equipped with 90 MM guns. He pointed out, however, that Pakistan must rely on sources outside of the country for ammunition supplies; that they have been able to acquire most of their stocks from England and the Continent, that he considers ammunition one of the critical problems within the military equipment. Some few years ago they had hoped to be able to accumulate a six-months reserve supply within the country but that the national economy did not permit. Since then they had to re-examine this project and have now reserve supplies from one to five months, depending upon the critical nature of the particular type of ammunition. The General pointed out that despite all of these handicaps, the morale, discipline and training of the Pakistan Army are superior, and that they constitute a real current and potential factor of force within this area.

The Secretary asked specifically what the General considered to be the needs of the Pakistan Army along the lines of military aid. The General replied that he had submitted just such a list a few months ago to the American Military Attaché in Karachi, but that he had brought with him this date the original of that memorandum. He gave this to the Secretary, who read it at some length and expressed his admiration for the thoughts contained therein. (. . . Since the Secretary expressed an interest in using this document at a later date, arrangements will be made for it to be available to him from the Pakistan Military Attaché in Washington by a telephone call from the Department of State.)

The Secretary next asked the General the state of the Air Force and air bases in Pakistan. To this he replied that at the time of partition Pakistan had only 3 Squadrons available; that they hoped to expand to 12 Squadrons, but here again the national economic situation had prevented this with the result that they have been able to establish and maintain only 6 Squadrons to date. These include 1 Jet Squadron based in the Karachi area, 2 or 3 Squadrons of conventional type aircraft based at Peshawar and Rawalpindi (portion of the planes from Peshawar are based at Miram Shah for action against tribal disorders in that area), and a transport squadron at Lahore. He stated that the transport squadron is used quite extensively to drop supplies to garrisons located in the inaccessible areas farther north of Gilgit. He said that the Air Force was efficient, but that they did desire to expand it if the economy of the country would permit such a measure.

In answer to the Secretary's question as to existent Air bases in Pakistan, he replied that there were very many of these throughout the country which had been established during World War II, the largest ones being located in the vicinity of the cities referred to above. He said that some of these fields have runways of 2,000 feet which could be extended without difficulty.

(I suggest that more detailed and perhaps more accurate information regarding Pakistan Air Force be obtained from Air Attaché reports in the Pentagon.)

Since the GG had brought up the question of liberty ships and tankers to me in a previous conversation I inquired as to the status of the Pakistan Navy to see if he held the same opinion as the GG regarding ships and tankers. He admitted that the Pakistan Navy was very small and its principal use was the defense of the ports of Karachi and Chittagong. In reply to a specific question by the Secretary regarding petroleum products, he answered that they produced only 17 per cent of their own needs and relied on tankers to transport the rest from the Middle East oil fields.

The Secretary next channeled the discussion toward the Kashmir disputes. In this regard the General emphasized the necessity to bring pressure on Nehru through a display on our part of the strongest interest in the settlement of this issue; that unless this was done, Nehru would be quite content to bide his time since a delay was profitable to the Indians, extremely detrimental to the Pakistanis. He attempted to allay any suspicion on our part that such military aid that might be forthcoming would be used against India, as they could not afford the expense of such a war which would only result in the weakening of both countries. (That same evening I mentioned to the General the GG statements to me to the effect that they would be willing to sign an agreement to go to India's aid in the event that any power should attack India. He said that he had forgotten to mention that and hoped that I would do so for him, to which I replied that I had already spoken to the Secretary about it.)

The General next expressed what is not only his concern but that of other leaders over the future of India when Nehru is either replaced or passes away. He feels very strongly that such occurrence would result in the dangerous splitting up of India into separate states, many of which would be susceptible and even amenable to Communist influence. He considers this a great danger to the future of Pakistan, feeling that there is no one in India with sufficient strength to take over after Nehru.

The Secretary spoke for several minutes expressing his conception of the recent change in Soviet tactics which could conceivably result in increased efforts in the direction of Southeast Asia. The General appeared interested and seemed aware of the global aspect of the present day conflict between the Communist and non-Communist worlds. His feeling is that the United States, which admittedly is the leader of the free world today, should not be afraid to openly aid those countries which have expressed a willingness, and even desire, to cooperate with the United States. He reiterated the potential, both in manpower and bases that is available in Pakistan and that his country under the present Government is extremely anxious to cooperate with the United States. He feels very strongly that if Pakistan were strengthened by United States economic and military aid, it would result in India dropping its present intransigent attitude, both toward Kashmir and other problems and even going so far as to having Nehru come to Washington in search of a settlement. He summarized this thought by saying that a strong Pakistan would frighten India out of her passiveness and intransigence.

Mr. Mohammed Ali, Prime Minister of Pakistan
Mr. Aziz Ahmed, Cabinet Secretary

The Secretary opened the conversation by outlining to the Prime Minister the present views of the U.S. Administration with respect to the recent Soviet shift of tactics. He said that we could see no evidence that there was any change in basic Soviet policy. The tactical shift of the Soviets to a peace offensive seemed designed to divide the free world and was in line with Stalin's article in Bolshevik published at the Communist Congress last October. If the Soviets could succeed in dividing the free powers and get them to quarrel and fight among themselves, they doubtless believed that they could realize their dream of world revolution without resorting to overt aggression. In connection with their attempts to divide the Free World, it was important to bear in mind chapter eight of Stalin's book on Leninism dealing with the exploitation of nationalism in dependent areas. The Prime Minister expressed agreement with the analysis set forth by Secretary Dulles.

The conversation next turned to the desirability of establishing some form of regional defense system in the Middle East. The Secretary stated that we had no preconceived or frozen ideas as to the form such a regional defense set-up might take. From his conversations in different countries visited on this trip, however, one thing seemed clear. This was that such an organization must have its roots in the area itself. No outside countries, no matter how friendly and well-disposed, could present a blue print and expect the countries of the region to accept it automatically. To succeed it must have the solid support of countries in the area and they must believe that their interests are best served by getting together and creating greater strength through collective action than they could have by each acting independently of the other. No country had sufficient strength to defend itself if it stood alone. Europe had recognized this and created western union through the Brussels Pact. This had been followed by NATO which greatly increased the scope and strength European defense. What was needed in the Middle East was someone to take the initiative with other members of this community.

The Prime Minister agreed. He felt that if Syria, Iraq, Iran, and Pakistan could develop some kind of a grouping to create a barrier across the Soviets' push towards the Arabian Gulf. Iran was a great obstacle because of the situation existing there. The other Arab states could back up such a grouping as that mentioned above but because of the Egyptian situation and their preoccupations over Israel, they were not disposed to any such initiative. In the creation of a regional grouping, the moral support of the U.S. and such material assistance as it might supply would be of great importance.

There was some discussion of the Suez Canal base following which the Prime Minister asked if the U.S. would, in the event some regional defense system could be established, plan to establish bases elsewhere as in Pakistan, for example. The Secretary made it clear that there were no U.S. Governmental positions on this and that what we could or could not do would depend on factors such as what the countries in the area did and what their desires were with respect to U.S. moral or material support.

In response to a question from Mr. Byroade, the Prime Minister next talked briefly about Afghanistan. He said he believed that the atmosphere was somewhat better between the two countries. There had been some general exchanges of views regarding the possibility of economic cooperation which might develop into something useful. If the Afghans would stop agitation on the question of Pushtoonistan,[2] there was no reason why good relations could not be established between the two countries. The Prime Minister said that the present Afghan regime felt a great sense of insecurity. The regime did not have strong internal backing and was faced with serious economic and political problems. He believed that one of the reasons the Afghans had been pushing the Pushtoonistan question was to divert the attention of the Afghan people from internal difficulties to external matters. For example, at the present time, there is a great disparity between the wage scales in Pakistan and Afghanistan, Pakistan wages being considerably higher. If the Afghan regime would devote itself to internal economic improvement which would be assisted by economic cooperation with Pakistan, its internal position would be stronger and it would probably feel less inclined to wrangle with Pakistan.

In conclusion, the Prime Minister said that he had one other matter which he wished to mention to the Secretary. This was the question of sending two Pakistan Naval Officers to the United States for submarine training. He hoped that the Secretary could look into this matter. The Secretary said he would be glad to do so but suggested that the Pakistan Government take this up with the U.S. Embassy through the Naval Attaché.

In his introductory statement the Prime Minister extended a cordial welcome to the American visitors and expressed the hope and expectation that the conversations which were to be held would be good not only for Turkish-American relations, but also for the entire free world.

Responding, the Secretary expressed his great pleasure at being in Turkey. He said that while the purpose of his trip as originally conceived was to visit the Arab capitals and South Asian countries, he found it impossible not to accept the invitation extended by the Turkish Government for him to stop in Ankara. His visit was not merely an act of courtesy and not merely to pay his respect for the great effort which Turkey is making, although it was in part to do those things, but he primarily wished to seek the views and advice of the Turkish leaders on matters of common interest. He said that he particularly hoped that the Prime Minister would express himself on:

(1) present Soviet policy and the Turkish interpretation of what is going on in Russia, and
(2) ways and means by which greater unity might be achieved within the Middle East area, where there is weakness and confusion which, it seems to the United States, is very dangerous at this time.

The Secretary said that he was at the disposal of the Prime Minister to discuss any matters of United States policy upon which the Prime Minister desired explanation.

By agreement, the Prime Minister set forth at some length his views upon international affairs with the understanding that the Secretary would later comment. He began with the general observation that the world is divided into two opposing forces: Russia and her satellites versus those countries which frankly opposed the communist menace. In between these groups were countries not definitely aligned with either. The Prime Minister said that there are substantial differences of methods employed by the two opposing forces. The Soviet countries act pursuant to one program, directed by one power, while the free world lacks this advantage. The links between the free countries suffer greatly as a result of clashes in local interest. If these countries were to consolidate their position they would constitute a much greater force. The Prime Minister felt that we should concentrate our efforts in that direction.

Relating this philosophy to situations in this part of the world, the Prime Minister said that the Suez Canal issue and difficulties in North Africa are problems in dealing with which we should have unity. He remarked that while the Secretary was in Egypt he had inquired of the Turkish Ambassador as to the views of his Government upon the Canal Zone issue. In this connection, the Prime Minister said that the Turks did not consider the Canal question to be exclusively between Egypt and the United Kingdom. A solution is, for example, of vital concern to Turkey and the question is one which concerns NATO strategy generally. The Egyptians could not properly maintain today that the nature of the British position in the Canal Zone is one of imperialism or of merely maintaining British interests. Turkey is convinced that the United Kingdom is acting as guardian of an outpost of one of the key positions of the free world. It is obvious also that the United States attaches great importance to the area; the fact that the United States maintains the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean is substantial evidence of this, as is, in fact, the visit of the Secretary of State to this part of the world. The Prime Minister believed the importance of maintaining the Canal Zone in safe hands to be equal to the importance of maintaining the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean.

In the Turkish view, according to the Prime Minister, attempts by Egypt to present the issue as a struggle for independence and freedom should be entirely secondary to the importance that the Canal Zone has to the entire free world as a point of strategy. He said that he believed that the Canal Zone problem could be solved, without adversely affecting Egyptian national aspirations, if the Egyptian Government understood the important point that the stationing of foreign troops in a country is no longer considered to be an infringement of sovereignty, as once was the case. The Turks, for example, possess airfields which they intend to use jointly with United States forces, and they do not feel that this involves in any way a question of infringing Turkish sovereignty. On the contrary, Turkey considers such arrangements to be elements of security for its very existence. In Egypt there is a tendency to overlook the danger facing the entire free world. . . .

Continuing, the Prime Minister said that the Turkish Government considered it to be of vital importance that the Canal area defenses be well maintained, and that the zone should not be evacuated unless and until suitable alternative arrangements have been made. The Prime Minister believed that evacuation should not even be considered until the expiration of the British-Egyptian treaty, which has about two more years to run, and even then evacuation should not take place until arrangements have been made for defense of the Canal area. He believed that the interested countries should get together now and consider defense arrangements to be effected after expiration of the treaty.

Turning to the question of Middle East defense, the Prime Minister commented that it had been the aim of all of us to provide for the association of the Arab countries in an organization to be created for this purpose. Each of the sponsoring countries strived in its own way to bring the Arabs into the organization. From various indications, including the status of negotiations on the Canal Zone, the Turkish Government has reached the conclusion that hope of having the Arab countries accept MEDO should be abandoned at this time. He believed that following these unsuccessful efforts a new leaf should be turned and a new enterprise undertaken. He expressed regret that the Arab countries failed to join; on the other hand, he felt that we should not exaggerate the importance of this and fall into despondency thereby. . . .

From this, the Prime Minister said, the conclusion can be drawn that in the defense of the Middle East, the backbone must be Turkey. In view of Turkey's social and political stability, the determined attitude of Turkey vis-à-vis the Soviet threat, and the very serious efforts which Turkey is making to expand her already strong forces, it is only natural that she would have a primary role in the defense of the area. He said that Turkey will continue to exert every effort to accomplish an organization of countries in the area, including eventually Pakistan, for Middle East defense, and on the other hand is working toward effective results of the Balkan pact as an important element in the defense of that area.

Turning to the problems of North Africa, the Prime Minister said that these should be studied from the same angle as the Canal problem; i.e., from the point of view of having in hand important strategic areas which are vital to the defense of the free world, and not simply as colonial problems. He remarked that in the Suez Canal controversy, the United Kingdom appeared to be left to itself; in the case of the North African disputes, France likewise appeared to be left alone. Such matters as these, which in the final analysis are of great concern to all NATO countries, should be taken into hand as common problems to be worked out in the common interests of the free world. In the NATO Council the question would be of finding solutions not alone on the basis of satisfying the national dignity of local countries, but in recognition of the fact that we face a relentless enemy employing tactics which require NATO to act with forceful decision in instances where we have interests essential to be maintained. The Prime Minister said that his comments in this connection naturally require further study and consideration, but he thought that the general line was worthy of careful thought.

The Prime Minister then referred to recent reports which he had received to the effect that a four-power conference with the Soviet Union had been seriously proposed and that Prime Minister Churchill favors such a meeting. He said that he is not certain whether the motivation for this conference was in the hope for concrete results or merely to prove that the Western powers sincerely and earnestly seek by every practicable means to find peace. Whatever the reason might be, however, the Prime Minister felt that the meeting would produce no concrete results and, on the contrary, might have an adverse effect upon the common front. Moreover, such a meeting might give rise to unfounded hopes in the Iron Curtain countries and in certain other countries such as Egypt. The Prime Minister expressed the view that if the Soviet Union should by any chance be willing to abandon or relax her aggressive policy, she would be the one to come to us and seek an understanding; Russia started the cold war, if it served her purpose she would end it. He emphasized the belief that contacts with Russia by the Western powers might create in the free world suspicion that a policy of appeasement is being adopted. He underlined the importance in the Turkish view of a united front and united policy among the free countries in these matters.

The Prime Minister then turned to the question of United States military aid. He said that Turkey has one of the longest frontiers with Russia and is, so to speak, in the same bed with her. Because of that, and because Turkey has long recognized the Soviet threat, a substantial portion of the Turkish budget has since the last war been expended on her military forces, it being fully determined to maintain Turkish independence and freedom even if the country should be left alone. Turkey has every intention of intensifying her efforts in that direction. As an example, the present forces of 330,000 men will be increased to 410,000 by next fall. The Turkish Government has adopted sound measures to increase the numbers of junior officers and NCOs and is instituting extensive measures of training to build up the number of technicians in necessary fields. Turkish force goals and force requirements were determined jointly, according to the Prime Minister, in the presence of representatives of JAMMAT and NATO. Those representatives came much closer to the Turkish point of view upon force goals after they observed the intensified efforts of the Turks. He said that as a result of this joint study and the preparations being undertaken by Turkey, the fact was established that by the end of 1953 Turkey would be in a position to absorb additional military equipment amounting to $500 million. The Prime Minister commented that it is easy to demand such sums, but that his Government is entirely aware that the United States is the only country in a position to supply arms and equipment to the rest of the free world. It is evident that if the Turkish Army were the only one needing help, it would be in "tip-top shape" now; but the Turkish Army is only one of many seeking American assistance.

The Prime Minister said he would like to stress one more fact pertinent to the establishment of the level of defense aid. In addition to Turkey's strategic position, her relentless determination to resist aggression, the social and political stability of the country, and her willingness to contribute forces to the common defense, it is clear that dollars spent in Turkey will buy more for defense than those expended in any other country. Continuing, the Prime Minister set forth his understanding that the funds included in Title II of the forthcoming aid bill had been reduced $30 million less than the amount appropriated last year. He said, however, that he had understood in conversation with Ambassador McGhee that Turkey would probably receive about the same amount of military aid as last year. However, Turkey is moved by the determination to speed up her effort, not to continue at the same level. He hoped that responsible United States representatives in Turkey, as they observed the fulfillment of Turkey's efforts, will become convinced that Turkey deserves more. As he understood the matter, it is possible to transfer up to 10% of Title I funds to Title II. He said that he cherished the hope that this might be done in Turkey's case, and that Turkey would prove that it is worthy of such additional assistance.

Regarding the matter of economic assistance, the Prime Minister said that Turkey is in the midst of an enormous development effort. He said that progress in no similar country can compare with that made in Turkey during the last four years, and especially the last three years. He commented that it fell upon him to state with gratitude that American economic aid had contributed in very large measure to this recovery and expansion. Economic assistance to no other country had been as effective as in the case of Turkey; every dollar given had been spent in its place and none wasted. He said that the Turkish Government naturally has in mind raising the standards of living of its people, but its most important goal is ultimately to be in a position to maintain a strong Army with Turkey's own resources.

The Prime Minister commented that an important experiment is going on in Turkey today. A large segment of the free world seemed to adopt the conviction that very speedy economic development could take place only under a totalitarian regime. Between 1950 and 1960 Turkey will illustrate how great progress can be achieved by giving way to free enterprise and economic liberty. The Prime Minister quoted a number of statistics to demonstrate progress made thus far since 1950, and said that if the present rate continues Turkey will soon be in a position to maintain its Army from its own resources assuming continued United States military end-item assistance.

The Prime Minister said that he expected that American economic aid would help to prepare the ground work for future private investment in Turkey after assistance of this type has ended. He said that economic aid at this time is necessary to help Turkey carry out her duty as "guardian of civilization and an element of security in this part of the world", where Turkey constitutes a bridge between the West and the undeveloped countries of the Near East. Without Turkey, the Prime Minister said, the question of Middle East defense would merely lie in theory.

The Secretary thanked the Prime Minister for his full and frank exposition of his views, which he stated was the kind of thing he came to Turkey to obtain. He said that because the time remaining at this particular meeting was short, he would respond only briefly to various points and he hoped that later in the evening they might have a chance to discuss the matter at more leisure.

The Secretary referred to the problem of unity among the free countries, which had been raised by the Prime Minister. He said that while he would not on this occasion enter into a philosophical discussion, he would like to point out that operations of the Soviet world under a single will is not only a source of strength but is also a point of weakness, since those subjected to a single will become themselves incapable of independent, resourceful action in case of emergency. He said that he quite recognized that the free nations should stand together in order to maximize their strength, and should improve their techniques of arriving at understandings, but he was not dismayed if at times they should disagree. That, the Secretary said, partakes of the very nature of the freedom which we are trying to preserve. Because of the importance which we attach to unity, however, we value the kind of talks which we were having with our Turkish friends—not to dominate one another, but to obtain a meeting of the minds.

Regarding the Suez Canal Zone issue, the Secretary said that he fully agreed with the point of view which the Prime Minister expressed; namely, that the area is one of international concern and not purely of concern to Egypt and the United Kingdom. He said that he sought to present the idea in his talks with General Naguib and the Revolutionary Committee in Egypt, and it seemed to be a novel point of view to them which they had not yet absorbed. The Secretary expressed the belief that all of us share concern in the Canal Zone issue and that each of us, in our own way and without concerted pressures, should strive to bring this point of view to the Egyptians. On the other hand, we must recognize that if the Base were to be held only by use of force against the people who surround it, it would be of little value. We are, therefore, striving on the one hand to bring realization to the Egyptian leaders of their responsibility, and on the other a solution which it should be possible for them to accept. The Secretary said that he had pointed out to the Egyptians that the United States has bases in England, and that England did not regard this to be a violation of her sovereignty.

Turning to the problem of MEDO, the Secretary said that he would fully accept the point of view expressed by the Prime Minister that Turkey would have to be the backbone of any such organization or of plans for the defense of the area. While a backbone is important, however, it is equally important that there be flesh around it. The Secretary said that he was surprised by the Prime Minister's indication that the Arab countries might be disregarded in this connection. From his own observations he questioned whether it was practicable at present to attempt to create a formal organization which would include all Arab states. Perhaps an organization such as MEDO would not be possible at the present time, but the Secretary expressed reluctance to go to the other extreme of feeling that the Arab countries should be wholly ignored with respect to plans for their own area. Some of the countries are more preoccupied with their own problems, such as Suez and Israel, etc., than with the bigger problem which preoccupies us. He expressed the opinion that in the northern Arab countries, such as Iraq, there is a sense of danger and he wondered whether it might be desirable, without activating a formal MEDO, to give some encouragement to selected Arab countries which seem to have the will and disposition to equip themselves to meet the big peril which we ourselves see. The Secretary expressed the hope that the Prime Minister would develop more fully the views which he expressed earlier in the meeting.

Referring to the question of the tripartite pact, the Secretary said that he wished to express the real gratification which the United States felt at the conclusion of the treaty and the development of better relations in the area to which it relates. He said that he was much impressed with what the Prime Minister had to say regarding further steps to integrate Yugoslavia into NATO. He stated that he could not at this time indicate the United States position upon that problem, except to say that he had an open mind and that there was now in his mind the point of view which the Prime Minister had expressed. He commented that there were several practical considerations which must be taken into account, some of which the Prime Minister had mentioned:

(1) The relationship of Yugoslavia and Italy, which should be improved by a settlement of the Trieste matter. The Secretary said that we have discussed this with both parties, and he had personally talked with Mr. De Gasperi about it.

(2) The attitude of the Scandinavian countries, which feel that too much attention is being given to Southern Europe and not enough to the north, and

(3) Our own public opinion in the United States, which is still disturbed by certain religious aspects of communist policy in Yugoslavia.

He pointed out these problems not as insuperable obstacles but as elements which have to be taken into account in making a decision upon this matter.

On the North African question, the Secretary said that the Prime Minister had made an extremely interesting and somewhat novel suggestion that, in relation to the Suez issue and the issues in North Africa, these should be open to negotiation as international and not just national problems. The Secretary thought it important in one way or another to divorce the question of common security which concerned us all from colonial issues. He said that the French have been extremely reluctant to give problems of this sort any kind of international aspect, because of their fear that the security considerations will not be divorced from colonial aspects. As an example, the French strongly oppose bringing to the Security Council the matter of the invasion of Laos for fear that they would be attacked as colonialists. They might possibly take a different view with respect to the NATO considering the North African situation, feeling that NATO would be sympathetic to their position. The Secretary commented that the suggestion certainly is an interesting one in relation to both problems.

With reference to the Prime Minister's comments upon the possibility of a four-power meeting with Russia, the Secretary said that there has been very strong pressure of public opinion for such a conference. He said that his knowledge of the immediate situation in Washington, London and Paris was somewhat limited by his absence during the past two or three weeks; however, when he left Washington the theme was that all aspects relating to the possibility of such a meeting should be very carefully examined before we commit ourselves to it. While it is always possible that a "conversion of spirit" might occur, we cannot forget the fact that the Soviet communists have always been taught that concessions and temporary retreats were parts of their tactics. The Prime Minister could therefore be assured that whatever we do will be done very carefully. The Secretary could not predict whether there would or would not be such a meeting, but he could state that if there were, the United States representatives would be very much on their guard. It is quite possible that the primary purpose of the Soviet Government may be to spread such confusion in Europe that the EDC is not created, and that Germany is not integrated. The Secretary said that it was a pleasure to hear the words of the Prime Minister with respect to this matter, as in so many places people are so eager for peace that they are willing to accept mere words as an excuse to imagine the possibility of getting what they hope for.

The Secretary then asked Mr. Stassen to comment upon the Prime Minister's statement on American military and economic aid.

Mr. Stassen said that he wished first to emphasize that what is done in the MSA program will be in accordance with the foreign policy leadership exercised by Mr. Dulles. Secondly, that the 1954 fiscal year MSA program has just recently been presented to Congress and until Congress acts it is not possible for anyone to make commitments as to what military or economic aid will be given to Turkey or to any other country. He stated that he would estimate that it may be two months before Congress acts upon the legislation, and that it would take approximately one month after that to relate the world-wide program to the Congressional action. In considering this program, Mr. Stassen said, we would have very much in mind the progress which Turkey has made. the determination that Turkey has evidenced, and the views which the Turkish Government has expressed; but it is also necessary, he said, to have in mind the world-wide responsibilities of our Government which are very heavy. He stated that President Eisenhower had wisely concluded that our own defense appropriation as well as our overseas programs must be somewhat reduced in order to be sure of the sound economic and financial position of the United States. The President has in mind that not only must the United States be strong in the face of the danger this year, but it must so pace itself as to be in a strong position over a period of years to meet any threat which might exist. Thus, he said, we are also concerned that none of our friends should over-extend themselves or count on too much American aid, and therefore keep themselves strong over a period of years. He commented that it is unlikely that Congressional action will make it possible to have economic assistance for Turkey as high as last year. A number of European countries will, in fact, receive no economic aid whatever.

Mr. Stassen expressed concern that our friends should have in mind a proper export-import balance in order to avoid building up a future problem which might become quite severe. We have in mind that the development progress in Turkey has been remarkable, and we earnestly hope that the progress will be continued on a sound basis.

Mr. Stassen concluded by saying that as soon as possible after Congress has acted upon the aid program we will advise the Turkish Government as to what the Turkish portion will be. He emphasized that, until the notice arrives, Turkey should not count on any particular amount since we cannot make advance commitments. He said that the Turkish Government may be sure that full consideration will be given to the progress which has been made and the Turkish determination, and that in making decisions upon the program he would follow the leadership of Mr. Dulles.

In concluding his own remarks, the Secretary commented that of all of our allies he believed that Turkey had the greatest awareness of the fundamental problem which confronts the free world, and the staunchest heart with which to meet it. He said that we were very proud to have this association with Turkey and expressed the hope that we would play a worthy part in it; he was confident that Turkey would always play a worthy part.

The Prime Minister thanked the Secretary, and said that before adjourning he wished to add a few words of clarification of his earlier remarks upon the question of collaboration with the Arabs. He said that the Turkish Government was very anxious to cooperate with the Governments of the Arab states; however, it sees that today they will not collaborate. On the other hand, the question of Middle East defense is urgent, and he felt it possible that if we should proceed with a defense plan it would act as an incentive for Arab countries to join. He said that there was no desire to disregard the Arab countries, but in fact we may be driven to it.

802. From the Secretary No. 10.

Understand detailed cable report of our conversations in Pakistan has been sent Department. Would like to supplement this by reporting genuine feeling of friendship encountered in Pakistan which exceeded to a marked degree that encountered in any country previously visited on this trip. Was impressed with appearance and spirit of what we saw of armed forces and their leaders. Have feeling Pakistan is one country that has moral courage to do its part in resisting communism.

Believe Pakistanis willing to meet Nehru half way in finding solutions to India-Pakistan problems. The solution of these problems is very important to the alleviation of Pakistan's critical economical and financial situation. Am not optimistic, however, that forthcoming meetings between Nehru and Mohammed Ali will result in such a solution. Believe we must find ways of maintaining steady pressure on Nehru for move by him on question of Kashmir.

Believe Pakistan would be cooperative member of any defense scheme that may emerge in Middle East and that we need not await formal defense arrangements as condition to some military assistance to Pakistan.

Need for wheat is unquestionably urgent and US action is required in US interest.

[1] This conversation took place after a dinner given by the President of Turkey at his residence in honor of the Secretary of State.

Director General of Second
  Department of Foreign Office,
  Orhan Eralp
Ambassador Zorlu

The President stated that there had been little opportunity for the Secretary of State to express his views fully at the meeting held earlier today with the Prime Minister; that he would appreciate it if the Secretary would comment on the subjects under discussion at that time and any other subjects that might be on his mind.

The Secretary replied that although the United States is not as close to the Soviet Union as Turkey, we do, however, have certain global responsibilities and we attempt to form our policies in respect to these responsibilities after full consultation with our Allies. We do not see in the present Soviet moves any basic change in their policy or in their strategy which is to attempt to rule the world. We interpret their present moves as an effort to gain time by appearing to make concessions in order to increase their strength. Present Soviet tactics are calculated to counteract the policies of our present administration which are more vigorous toward certain areas of the world.

In his inaugural message to the Congress President Eisenhower announced the end of the neutralization of the coast of China by the 7th Fleet. The Secretary and Mr. Stassen both went to Europe in an attempt to ensure the rearming of Germany and its incorporation into the European Defense community. [2] They are both now travelling in the Middle East, an area which has previously been neglected by the United States, in order to help strengthen this area. Thus, in the Far East, Middle East and Europe, the United States is moving forward more vigorously. The present effort of the USSR constitutes an attempt to thwart this activity by attempting to prove peaceful intentions. Although we believe that under Divine Providence it is possible for the worst sinner to repent, and must be willing to keep an open mind, we must not accept the Soviets at their face value until their actions prove their words.

Unfortunately some of our allies are so anxious to relieve themselves of their present burdens that they are willing to believe the Soviet words. We must work to maintain the cooperation of these allies. We must take their views into consideration. We must, however, constantly be on guard to preserve our strength, not for one, two or three years, but for 15 or 20 years. Beginning with the Korean war in 1950, the United States and others started an effort which is of a magnitude which we cannot sustain forever. It is important to find a scale of military expenditures that can be sustained without harming our currency or economy. Stalin once wrote that the struggle in which we are engaged would last for an entire historical era, and that the moment that the Soviet blow would come would be when their adversaries were at loggerheads with each other and had exhausted themselves. Their policies therefore must be ones which can be maintained for an entire historical era.

If today the United States is cutting expenditures, both for our own defense effort and for foreign aid in order to balance our budget, it is not that we think that the peril is over but that we must put ourselves in a position to maintain our defensive effort for a long time. The productive capacity of the United States is so tremendous that we can maintain strength without endangering our economy and risking inflation. This decision was taken by General Eisenhower in December during his trip to Korea, which was long before Stalin's death. What the new administration is doing, therefore, is not because it is fooled by Soviet tactics.

The Secretary stated that the reason he and Mr. Stassen are here is because of the weakness in the area between Turkey and Pakistan. He said that during their visit they were impressed with the strength of Pakistan and their willingness to fight. Beyond Pakistan there are, of course, many problems: those of Korea, Indochina and Burma. We do not wish at the moment to burden you with these problems, said the Secretary. However, we do seek your help in the Middle East. The Middle East Defense Organization, which was a plan for Middle East defense invented some two years ago, has not proven to be any good. Too many states not part of the area and too many states in the area who are more interested in quarrelling over Israel and the Suez base than the defense of the area were included in the original plan. Since Turkey is in the Middle East and is interested in its defense, I would like, said the Secretary, to hear the views of your Government on this question.

The President replied that it is true that the Turks had lived as neighbors with Russia for many centuries, during which time they had fought many bloody wars. Russian policy has always played an important part in Turkish history. At the present time, however, there are not even minor frontier incidents with Russia, of the type that occurred when they were more friendly with Russia. Two years ago the Russians forced many ethnic Turks in Bulgaria to immigrate to Turkey. Now, however, there is calm on the Bulgarian frontier. This gives the Turks a clear impression that the Russians do not have any intention of bringing pressure to bear against them. The Turks, however, do not see any change in Russian policy either toward Turkey or the world. I agree, therefore, Mr. Secretary, with what you said, stated the President. One of the Russian tactics is to compromise when necessary. However, their objective remains to rule the world by Communism. The Turks are therefore continuing preparations within the limits of their potentialities and are hoping that the other NATO countries will not relax their efforts.

The Secretary replied that he felt that the other NATO countries had the same basic attitude toward the situation that the President had expressed. In the recent NATO meeting they had in fact passed a resolution to this effect. Because of internal political pressures, however, they have taken measures which have the effect of relaxing their effort, perhaps against the better judgment of their governments.

The President commented that such relaxation is dangerous to the ultimate NATO aim, to which the Secretary agreed.

The President said that he found that the policy, as stated by the Secretary, of continuing United States military effort in such a way as not to endanger the United States economy, was wise. We cannot, he said, judge your ability. On the other hand, if the impression is created that the United States is wavering, others will relax. The United States should never let go of the rudder of the ship.

The President continued that he would be brief in his discussion of the question raised with respect to the Middle East. I too, he said, do not envisage the formation of the Middle East Defense Organization. There are a number of Arab countries and there is the so-called Arab League. When we talk with the Arab countries individually they appear to have reasonable views. However, the position of the Arab League is always the same. The Arab countries vie with each other in proving their nationalism and in proving that they are "more tough than the other guy". There are several knotty problems which they put forward in justification of their position: that of Israel, Suez, and the independence of several Arab countries. Even if these questions were solved, however, I do not believe they would be on our side. They put forward "puerile" arguments threatening the West with an association with Russia. They appear unaware of the greater danger which Russia represents. Under the circumstances we should feel free, in the event of war, to conduct our strategy as the situation dictates.

Take Suez, continued the President. The Egyptians present the Suez issue as one of independence. Independence is of course a sacred right, but we do not believe that this is the real issue in the case of Suez. How can such a strategic key position be left in the hands of people whose policy is so uncertain? My colleagues have, I believe, spoken to you in general of the present situation in the Arab countries. I will therefore do no more than to say that in my judgment the Middle East Defense Organization cannot be set up. In their present attitude I do not believe that the Arab states would be on our side tomorrow, even if we gave them arms. In response to the Secretary's comment that the view he had expressed was a pessimistic one, the President replied "I hope I am wrong".

The Secretary asked the President if he did not consider that any of the Arab states were reliable. To this the Prime Minister replied that even if they found one, what would they do with it?

The President added that Iraq was, in their judgment, more reliable than the rest. If Abdullah were alive, he would have confidence in Jordan, because of him and because of the British influence there. In Syria, however, any tough guy with a shotgun can take over at will.

The Secretary asked whether or not the President believed that Colonel Shishikli had any real promise in Syria. The President replied that all evidence which the Turks had was to the contrary. Shishikli has many enemies. Although Shishikli was more friendly than the previous dictator, who encouraged Communism under the guise of socialism, his tenure is doubtful.

The President continued that General Naguib had in his earlier days created a favorable impression on the Turks. His policy of land reform and his attempts to raise the standard of living had given them hope. We now, however, consider him the symbol of an extremist group. I recently read a statement, said the President, which General Naguib has not denied, expressing his conviction that Malenkov is a peace-loving man who would bring peace to the world. The normal course for Egypt was to take its place among the free nations of the world to assist in solving our problems. Who is he threatening and what can he gain by these threats?

The President said that he could not express an opinion on the Saudi Arabian Government. If it were successful in raising an army he might consider it. However, even then it would not break with the Arab League with whom it must show a common front.

If threatened tomorrow, Turkey would fight for its independence and that of the free world. I cannot see, said the President, how we can join with the Arab countries. We have lived with them for many years. We have a common religion and social traditions. We have attempted to capitalize on that for three years, especially during the last five months. However, we have concluded that we cannot deal with them under their present rulers. They will not fight. People who will not risk death can never fight. Whatever needs to be done we will do so in solidarity with our allies. However, the fact is that our right flank is exposed and in great danger.

The President continued that Turkey would like to befriend the Arabs, if for no other reason than to avoid harm from them. I do not want to give up the MEDO for good, he said. We will continue to do our part along with our friends and allies. If any of the Arab states wish to speak we will be glad to talk with them. Perhaps Iraq will do so.

The Secretary said that we must not abandon our effort to build up strength on Turkey's exposed flank. The President replied that he agreed but "how will we go about it?" The Secretary said he did not know, but that we must not abandon our efforts. We must give friendly help in the hope that developments will take a different shape. If the Suez issue can be solved, and if the present tension between the Arab states and Israel can be relieved, a situation can be created which will permit development of strength in the Arab states.

The President asked in rejoinder: "How can NATO consent to the evacuation of British troops in the absence of a government in Egypt sympathetic to the NATO cause?" The Egyptians now demand unconditional evacuation of the British forces, even before discussion of the question. When we first approached Egypt in collaboration with our allies, inviting them to join in the Middle East Command, we did so under the assumption that there was no infringement of Egyptian sovereignty and that she would be accepted as an equal. If I were Egypt, I would have accepted our offer and then sought to obtain my rights. We have in the meantime frequently spoken to Egypt in friendly terms along these lines.

As to Israel, continued the President, if anyone is shocked at its independence it should be Turkey, as it formerly belonged to Turkey. We now look at Israel quite differently and are glad to recognize Israel. The Arabs, however, look at it only through their own emotions. Sentiment and ambition defy solution.

The problem of the Arab refugees, continued the President, should first be solved. If the question of the frontiers between Israel and the Arab states could be solved, the "chip on the shoulder" of the Arabs would be relieved to a considerable extent. It must be drilled into their minds that they can gain nothing by supporting Russian policy. They must be told that their present attitude is a bluff which they cannot possibly carry into action.

The Secretary replied that he greatly appreciated this frank expression by the President, the authority of which he fully respected. We still hope, however, he stated, that the Arabs can gradually be brought into an association with you and with us. I admit that the immediate situation is gloomy. However, it is possible that the Arabs will change their view and that we can make them change.

The area they occupy is so important that we must not abandon our efforts.

The Secretary thereupon stated that he understood that since the President and the Prime Minister were leaving early in the morning to visit the new Turkish brigade training for service in Korea he felt that he must part. The President replied that Turkey was proud to be fighting alongside of the American Army in Korea.

The Secretary stated that he had a letter to deliver to the President from General Eisenhower, from whom he brought greetings to the President. General Eisenhower was greatly impressed with the Turks during his visit while NATO Commander and often spoke of the great effort that the Turks were making.

The President asked to be remembered to President Eisenhower, for whom he expressed the greatest admiration.

TOP SECRET [ATHENS,] May 27, 1953—4 p. m.

Subject: Greece

Participants:

United States	Greece
Secretary John Foster Dulles	Prime Minister Papagos
Honorable Harold Stassen
Mr. Douglas MacArthur II
Mr. Henry A. Byroade
Ambassador Peurifoy
Mr. Alexander Schnee

In opening the conversation the Field Marshal expressed his great pleasure at welcoming Mr. Dulles not only because he was Secretary of State of the United States but because the Field Marshal knew of the personal leadership that Mr. Dulles had exercised in the struggle against Communism.

The dangers of Communism are well known to the Greek people, who if called upon will be prepared to make any sacrifices necessary in order to defeat Communist aggression and in order to protect their national security. Greece is fully conscious of her obligations to defend her national borders and places her common NATO commitments above all else.

Despite the great harm which befell Greece as a result of the assistance Yugoslavia afforded the Communist guerillas, Greece realizes that the cooperation of Yugoslavia is necessary to the defense of the Balkans and Greece is therefore cooperating with Yugoslavia (and Turkey) to the end that the Balkan area may be made more secure. The Field Marshal stressed the role which the Balkan front could occupy in the event of the outbreak of armed conflict. Providing that the three armies (Greek, Yugoslav and Turkish) would be reinforced with the necessary war matériel, the Balkan front could become an area of active operations rather than an area of passive defense. The disadvantage of the Balkan front today lies in its inadequate depth. This position could be corrected and the front could be turned into a serious threat to the flanks of the Soviet Armies advancing in Europe.

The defense of the Balkans would be further strengthened if a rapprochement were reached between Yugoslavia and Italy. The Prime Minister referred to the present difficulties which centered about the forthcoming Italian elections but stated that his recent conversations with De Gasperi and the Yugoslav Foreign Minister Popovich indicated to him that both men appreciate the necessity of such a rapprochement. After the Italian elections the Trieste issue should be ameliorated.

The Field Marshal stated his firm conviction that freedom-loving nations must realize that their objectives can only be achieved through unity and the adoption of a common policy. The recent Soviet (peace) proposals should be received with considerable reserve and should be met by a common and firm policy. If a common and firm policy is not adopted by the free nations there is a danger that the Soviets will succeed in their efforts to shatter the unity of the allied nations or succeed in disrupting the rhythm of rearmament which has so effectively been maintained to date.

The Marshal then referred to the recent visit of Bidault, pointing out that Bidault arrived in Athens after Churchill had made his important foreign policy statement in Parliament. The Marshal informed the Secretary that Bidault had expressed the conviction that the slightest indication of deviation among the allies must be avoided at all costs.

Referring to the morale of the Greek people, the Prime Minister pointed out that even before Greece joined NATO and even if left without assistance from her friends, the Greek people were determined to resist aggression and protect their independence. The psychological resources of a nation are particularly important, more important than material factors. Referring to his experience in five wars and lessons learned from history, the Field Marshal observed that the sudden fall of states is usually due to psychological rather than material factors. Two examples were cited: (1) In 1940 during the Second World War France was crushed in three weeks. We now know that German military superiority was not as great as had been previously thought. France was lost because of the defeatist attitude of the population. French soldiers asked themselves, "Why should I fight?"—and didn't fight; (2) Greek soldiers who fought in Asia Minor did not understand the necessity of fighting what they considered to be a colonial war.

The free people must be prepared to make new sacrifices. The Greek Government is preparing the people to this end. The large amount of military expenditures maintained by the government, amounting to 43% of the national budget, constitute a heavy burden on the Greek people The Greek Government cannot do otherwise than to maintain this heavy military budget because the strength of the Greek forces is dictated by the nation's geographic location and the potential of Greece's adversaries. Greece must maintain a military establishment which will permit it to resist a sudden attack and to cover the mobilization of the Greek armed forces. To achieve this objective, Greece is required to keep twice as many men under arms as would otherwise be necessary. The Greek people understand this requirement. They have a feeling of sacrifice. The burden on the economy is reflected in the standard of living of the people.

Fortunately the present government has a strong majority, is homogeneous and is stable. The Government will not hesitate to resort to unpopular and even harsh measures. It has already done so. The Field Marshal noted that he had only entered politics in order to serve the country and that, therefore, he does not hesitate to take unpopular measures as they become necessary. He cited as an example the reduction in the salaries of the Deputies.

The Marshal then raised the subject of the projected Middle East Defense Organization, expressing the view that Greece should not be ignored in the development of such an organization. While it is true that the bulk of the Greek armed forces would operate in the Balkans, there is an inter-relationship between the defense of the Balkans and Middle East areas. If Greece were to be ignored entirely, and was not represented at least symbolically, as in Korea, the effect on the Greek people would be very unfavorable. The issue would become even more difficult were the Headquarters of a Middle East defense organization established on Cyprus. The Government, in accordance with the policy he outlined before the election, views the Cyprus problem realistically and seeks a solution which would not disrupt the existing pleasant Anglo-Greek relations, but no Greek government can afford to ignore the Cyprus issue. The issue arises not only from historical national aspirations but also from such popular axioms as "the self-determination of free people". It is most important, in the view of the Marshal, that the morale of the Greek people remain on the high level on which it stands today.

In conclusion the Prime Minister reiterated that Greece is devoted to the obligations it has undertaken vis-à-vis its allies. The best way to meet the danger lies in a true alliance of all free countries, a common policy and, above all, a firm stand against the USSR in support of the policy which the U.S. originated and which was inspired by Secretary Dulles.

The Secretary conveyed sincere and cordial greetings from President Eisenhower and stated that the President was happy to receive the personal letter from the Field Marshal. The President deeply appreciates the proposals contained in that letter. The views of the U.S. will be fully expressed in a communication to the Prime Minister. There was not sufficient time to set those views down prior to the departure of the Secretary on this trip. In particular, the U.S. appreciates the fine suggestion regarding the augmentation of Greek forces in Korea. A decision on this matter will depend upon the outcome of current discussions in Korea which may end the fighting. At this point the Prime Minister observed that Greece had originally been prepared to send one full brigade, but that the force was limited to one battalion at the request of the United States. When Marshal Papagos added that "the borders of Greece are where the fighting is going on", the Secretary commented on the fine spirit demonstrated by this remark and observed that the free world would be strengthened if all the nations shared that spirit to the same extent as does the Prime Minister.

With reference to the Secretary's expression of thanks for the Greek Government's gift of the new Embassy site, the Field Marshall observed that Ambassador Peurifoy has helped the Government very much in all its efforts since it came into office and that, more importantly, he had helped all of Greece. The gift of the site was only a small token of the gratitude of the Greek people.

With reference to Soviet Russia, the Secretary stated that the United States recognizes the possibility of a fundamental change but that evidence to date indicates a change in tactics only. The Prime Minister added that this was precisely his view. The Greeks know the Communists well and know that they have certain good points including that of always being able to pursue a realistic policy. Their final aims remain the same but they adopt different tactics as required. The Secretary noted that the tactics of the Communists were designed to weaken the resolution of the free nations. We should do our best to thwart this.

Going back to the Prime Minister's reference to the importance of not breaking the rhythm of rearmament, the Secretary explained that the adjustments incorporated in the budget presently under consideration in the United States do not reflect any intention on the part of the United States to interrupt this rhythm. To the contrary, the purpose of these adjustments is to achieve a rate of rearmament which can be maintained over a period of time. It has long been the view of General Eisenhower, expressed to NATO, that there must be a relationship between the military establishment of a nation and the economic productivity behind the defense forces. Some slight adjustment may be necessary to achieve the required balance. It is still the intention of the United States to devote 60% of its budget to defense requirements. The United States intends to do this without creating an inflationary cycle which would increase costs and make the maintenance of the defense effort impossible. This philosophy was expressed by General Eisenhower in 1951 on the occasion of a NATO meeting in Rome. It became national U.S. policy shortly after he was elected to the Presidency. The Secretary emphasized that not by one single dollar do the adjustments in the U.S. budget reflect a weakening of the defense effort in response to recent Soviet tactics.

As regards the importance of the morale factor, Secretary Dulles stated that we share the Marshal's views with regard to the supreme importance of that factor. Therefore, we believe it is necessary to focus our attention not only on the defense build-up but also on the economic and financial factors.

With reference to the projected Middle East Defense Organization, the Secretary stated that on this trip he gained the impression that the development of a Middle East Defense Organization would have to proceed more slowly than was previously thought. It was, therefore, not yet in order to think in terms of where the headquarters of such an organization will be established. The Prime Minister stated that he understood there was much to be done in this field, particularly in the area of Anglo-Egyptian relations. The Secretary assured the Prime Minister that if at any time thought is given to the establishment of a Middle East headquarters in an area so historically important to Greece, the position of the Greek Government will be carefully considered.

The British-Egyptian difficulties regarding the Suez present a very disturbing problem. We must all exert all the influences we possess to prevent that conflict from breaking out into hostilities. Marshal Papagos quickly agreed that there was no doubt about that.

The Secretary then said he was happy to learn that the Prime Minister was thinking in terms of developing offensive possibilities in the Balkan area. The greatest security for each of us lies in the Soviet knowledge that if one is attacked, others might counterattack in some other place. If our attitude is defensive, the Soviets will be encouraged to concentrate all their forces for the offensive. We, therefore, appreciate the initiative which Greece undertook in strengthening the defense of the Balkan area. What has been started may develop into one of the strong aspects of the Balkan defense.

The Secretary then expressed U.S. appreciation of the fact that Greece has a strong government capable not only of taking forceful military measures but also capable, if necessary, of taking unpopular measures at home. By cutting the salaries of the Deputies, the Government achieved the highest mark of any democratic government!

Secretary Dulles then informed the Field Marshal that the President wished to extend an invitation to the King and Queen to visit the U.S. some time next Fall. If the Prime Minister has no objection, the Secretary will deliver the invitation this evening. The Marshal replied that not only does he not have any objection, but, to the contrary, it would make him very happy for the King and Queen, who represent the Greek people, to have the opportunity to express their thanks to the American Government and the American people for assistance extended to Greece. The Secretary expressed the view that the King and Queen would be received with admiration for the courageous spirit of Greece which they symbolize.

In conclusion, the Secretary stated that he had had good talks with Minister Markezinis in Washington. The Prime Minister stated that Greece only wants the opportunity to set the basis for a self-sufficient economy, as it realizes that economic aid cannot be continued indefinitely. As the Secretary and his party were pressed for time for their next appointment, this subject was not pursued any further.

Mr. Tsouderes, Minister without Portfolio
Mr. Kanellopoulos, Minister of National Defense
Mr. Kapsalis, Minister of Commerce
Mr. Papayannis, Minister of Finance

Mr. Stephanopoulos opened the conversation with words of welcome in which he gave recognition to the distinguished career of Secretary Dulles. He referred to the recent tri-pact between Greece, Turkey and Yugoslavia as well as Greece's interest in the stability of the Middle East and expressed thanks on behalf of his Government for U.S. aid and for the agreement of the U.S. to the necessity of implementing a long-term development program in Greece. (Text of Mr. Stephanopoulos' remarks are attached as Enclosure "A"). [2]

Mr. Dulles, in reply, said that the United States was aware of the effort which Greece was making to strengthen herself both in the military and economic fields. He emphasized that it was necessary to find the proper balance between economic and military effort. The U.S. at this time is likewise seeking to strike such a balance which would balance the American budget and possibly permit reduction of taxes. A program of foreign military and economic aid for the next fiscal year has been submitted to the Congress after very careful study. Mr. Dulles expressed his hope that the foreign aid program would receive favorable action but warned that it was necessary for the Executive Branch of the Government to respect the constitutional prerogative of the Congress in appropriating funds. He stated that the U.S. welcomes economic planning on the part of her allies which would make the continuation of U.S. foreign aid unnecessary.

Mr. Stassen opened his remarks by saying that under President Eisenhower the Mutual Security Program will be closely coordinated with and carried out under the foreign policy leadership of Mr. Dulles. He emphasized that the financial burdens on the U.S. are extremely heavy and will affect what can be done in Greece. He pointed out that Greece is in a special position inasmuch as Greece has large volumes of military and economic aid from previous appropriations which have not yet been delivered. For this reason, Greece's present position is quite strong and therefore any new monies appropriated by the Congress will not fully reflect the total volume of aid which will arrive during FY 1954.

Mr. Stassen stated that the Mutual Security Administration had agreed that some of the aid previously appropriated, but as yet not utilized, could be used to begin certain new projects in the capital investment program provided these projects are approved and are within the limit of funds available. He cautioned that it would be necessary to make maximum use of private investment funds in order to realize a program of the magnitude contemplated by the Greek Government and pointed out that the Eisenhower Administration proposed as a matter of policy to rely upon private capital as being the more desirable form of financing a program of capital investment. Careful use of all funds available is essential if they are to fulfill the requirements of Greece and the United States. The U.S. continues to be interested in the future economic and military development of Greece; however, it should be understood that the major part of the responsibility for this development rests upon the people and the Government of Greece. Under the foreign policy guidance of Mr. Dulles the Mutual Security Administration hopes to play some part in the future development of Greece. The details of the American Aid Program for FY 1954 will be communicated to the Greek Government through the Ambassador and through the Chiefs of the Military and Economic Missions after the Congress has acted.

Mr. Kanellopoulos then expressed his appreciation for American assistance to the Greek Armed Forces. He pointed out that although the Greek Government would continue to do its best to meet its military burden, and although Marshal Papagos has declared that the Greek Government would not reduce the ceiling strength of its forces, Greece is confronted with serious budgetary increases next year resulting from the NATO obligations. He requested that the American authorities re-examine the question of Greek military expenditures.

Mr. Kanellopoulos then referred to the need for additional equipment in the Greek Army, a problem to which, he insisted, Generals Ridgway and Gruenther were very sympathetic. He pointed out that while Greece has ten (10) divisions, Bulgaria has eleven (11); Greece has 239 light tanks and 550 pieces of artillery, while Bulgaria has 750 heavy tanks and 2,000 pieces of artillery.

The Secretary then expressed his regret that his schedule would not permit a more exhaustive discussion, and particularly that he had not had opportunity to talk further with Mr. Stephanopoulos, who had played such an important part in directing the negotiations of the Greece–Turkey–Yugoslavia pact. He expressed willingness to receive and study on his return trip any memoranda which the Greek Government might care to submit prior to his departure.

At the conclusion of the meeting, an Aide-Mémoire setting forth Greece's views on the Middle East Defense Organization was submitted. (Copy attached as Enclosure "B"). [3]

CONFIDENTIAL [TRIPOLI,] May 28, 1953.

ST D–12

Subject: Libya

Participants:

United States	Libya
The Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State.	Mahmoud Muntasser, Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs.
Mr. Harold Stassen, Director of Mutual Security Agency.	Sayyed Suleiman Jerbi, Libyan Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.
Mr. Henry S. Villard, Minister to Libya.

Mr. Dayton S. Mak, Political Officer, American Legation.
Mr. Mirwan Afifi, Arab
  Secretary, American Legation.

The Libyan Prime Minister opened the discussion by welcoming the Secretary and his party to Libya. He then presented the Libyan Government's views on matters of political importance to Libya, which was followed by a statement of Libya's need for economic (financial) assistance. The Prime Minister's comments on political matters are embodied in the memorandum which he gave to the Secretary during the course of the meeting. [2]

The Prime Minister stated that he is hopeful that the United States financial contribution to Libya will be increased, pointing out that Libya is extremely poor and in great need of foreign assistance. Libya, he added, is an infant of the United Nations and consequently a child of the United States as well. The Prime Minister stated that Libya has a five million pound annual deficit which he hopes Britain and the United States, through mutual agreement, will cover. He pointed out that it will be seen from the budget figures, which are included in a memorandum given by the Prime Minister to Secretary Dulles, that the Libyan budget is primarily for "care and maintenance" and is not filled with items of extravagance and non-essentials. For example, Cyrenaica had practically no water and no electric power. It was necessary, of course, to remedy this, and in Tripolitania there are many things which must be done to improve living conditions.

It is essential, the Prime Minister stated, that Libya raise the standard of living of its people and create an economy that will not provide for the needs of the populace but will provide a bit more than the bare necessities of life. Last year, he pointed out, Cyrenaica suffered from a severe famine due to lack of rainfall. This year

[2] Not printed; it asked the U.S. Government to reconsider the temporary military agreement concluded between Libya and the United States in December 1951. The provisions Libya wanted to renegotiate concerned the duration of the agreement and the sum allocated to Libyan assistance. (Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 156) For documentation on the negotiations for the temporary agreement, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, pp. 1313 ff.

Tripolitania, particularly in the interior, received insufficient rainfall and will be threatened by a similar famine.

The Prime Minister then switched to the subject of Communism in Libya. Tripolitania, he pointed out, unlike Cyrenaica, has a considerable foreign population and there is a constant threat of Communist propaganda and activity. Tunis is the primary source of such propaganda. The Libyan Government has been well aware of the Communist threat and found it necessary to deport a number of Italian Communists. Libya, however, has been able to confine Communist activities in the country. The best way, however, to combat Communist propaganda is to improve the standard of living of the Libyan people and eliminate hunger. To do this, Libya requires the assistance of the United States. One of the main features of United States policy is to raise the standard of living of the peoples of the world. No country has greater need for raising the standard of living of its people than Libya.

Libya, the Prime Minister said, is very sincere in its desire to cooperate closely with the United States Government. Libya needs the cooperation and assistance of the United States even more than the United States needs the cooperation of Libya. Although you may hear rumors to the effect that Libya does not want to conclude an agreement (military) with the United States, he said, I tell you now emphatically that this is not true. On the contrary, he added, it is the desire of the Libyan Government and the Libyan people not only conclude an agreement with the United States but also to conclude such an agreement as quickly as possible.

The Prime Minister concluded his remarks by expressing his great appreciation for the assistance and cooperation he has received from Minister Villard and his staff, and Colonel Anthis (Commanding Officer of Wheelus Field) and his staff. He again thanked Secretary Dulles for including Libya in his Middle East tour.

Secretary Dulles thanked the Prime Minister for his comments and expressed his great satisfaction for being able to include Libya in his tour of the Middle East. He added that President Eisenhower is likewise gratified that the Secretary's visit to Libya and the other countries of the Middle East was possible. This is evidence of the great importance that President Eisenhower places on the Middle East. At this point the Prime Minister interrupted to express the great respect and high regard of the Libyan people for President Eisenhower and his administration and he wished them the best of success.

The Secretary then expressed his great appreciation for the Libyan Government's kind gesture in giving a piece of land upon which will be built a United States Legation building. The Prime Minister replied that the Libyan Government is very pleased to present this small gift to the American Government and he hoped to see Minister Villard soon living in the residence which is to be erected on the site. The Secretary then said he was happy that the Prime Minister appreciated the qualities of Minister Villard and pointed out that although Mr. Villard has on numerous occasions told the Libyans "No" to certain requests, this should not be taken as evidence of any lack of sympathy or understanding on his part of Libya's problems or needs. Minister Villard, it should be remembered, is doing so on direct instructions from the United States Government, which can, at times, be rather hard-hearted.

The Secretary then referred to the Prime Minister's statements regarding Libya's need for additional financial assistance from the United States and pointed out that the United States itself is having financial difficulties of its own. The people of the United States, he added, are paying possibly the highest taxes in the world, and the United States Government's budget is out of balance by a considerable amount. The American people hope and expect the new administration to reduce taxes and balance the budget. Already it is certain that the United States Government's budget will be severely cut. The budget of the Department of State alone, will be cut approximately 30%. It is certain that Congress will examine carefully the United States foreign aid program. At the same time, the Secretary added, the United States will always want to deal fairly with her friends, of whom Libya is considered as one. The Secretary stated that the Prime Minister can be assured that the United States Government will examine carefully the contents of the two memoranda (political and economic) as well as the Libyan Government's suggestions for revision of the United States Base Rights Agreement. He added that he, himself, did not come to Libya to negotiate the base agreement or any other agreement, but he assured the Prime Minister that those responsible for the negotiations will give their fair and prompt consideration. The Prime Minister then interrupted to say that the Libyans will do likewise. The Secretary stated that he accepted the Prime Minister's assurance that the Libyans desire an agreement with the United States. The Prime Minister interrupted to say "and very quickly".

The Secretary agreed that the United States needs Libya and that Libya needs the United States and the benefits which accrue to Libya as a result of the presence of the Americans. He added that formerly it was believed in every agreement between two parties, one would gain and one would lose. This is a bad principle and is neither true nor necessary. An agreement must be a mutually satisfactory arrangement. The Secretary said that undoubtedly the Prime Minister was aware that aside from the amount of direct economic aid, Libya benefits considerably from the expenditures of the United States forces here and is provided with considerable foreign exchange in this manner. With regard to Libya's becoming a bridge between the West and the East, the Secretary stated, it is fortunate that there is such a country in the Middle East as Libya, whose leaders appreciate both the views of the East and the West.

The Secretary then pointed out that his visit is the first such visit of an American Secretary of State to the Middle East and it is evidence of President Eisenhower's realization of the importance of that area. He added that the situation in the Middle East is full of problems and even dangers. He suggested that all persons of authority in the Middle East must use their influence to prevent any conflagration over such issues as the UK-Egyptian dispute over the Suez Canal Zone.

The Secretary then presented a letter from President Eisenhower addressed to King Idris I, after which he thanked the Prime Minister for the kind reception given him and his party by the Libyan Government. He pointed out that he and Mrs. Dulles are delighted with Tripoli and wish they could stay longer.

The Prime Minister stated that Libya appreciates the heavy burden on the United States tax payers and the general burden which has fallen on the shoulders of the American people. He added, however, that the amount of money which Libya is asking from the United States is very little in comparison to the other outlays made by the United States to other countries. Although the sum asked by Libya is little, the United States Government as the donor will benefit greatly by the gift as will the West in general. Libya, he stated, is in the heart of the Mediterranean, and has a coastline of some two thousand kilometers. In case of war Libya can become a door or a dam with respect to the East. It is a bridge to Western North Africa and to the other countries in West Africa. This, however, is from the material point of view. From the moral point of view—if the Libyans have a good standard of living they will help create stability in the world. which is essential at this time.

MIDDLE EAST COMMAND

PROBLEM

To seek active United Kingdom collaboration in the early establishment of the Middle East Command with headquarters if feasible at Cyprus.

U.S. OBJECTIVES

The Middle East Command has both political and military aspects. At the present time it is more a political problem than a military one and the United States seeks through the Middle East Command to gain active Middle Eastern cooperation with the West in the defense of the Middle East on a cooperative basis. The Middle East Command also offers a possible solution of the Anglo-Egyptian problem. On the other hand, steps leading to the establishment of a Middle East Command must not be permitted to obstruct the firm integration of Greece and Turkey into NATO.

[2] Lot 59 D 95 is a collection of documentation on certain official visits of European heads of government and foreign ministers to the United States and on major international conferences (including North Atlantic Council sessions) attended by the Secretary of State for the period 1949-1955, as maintained by the Executive Secretariat of the Department of State. This lot consists of 13 feet of material, was retired by S/S, and is located in RSC boxes 94-106.

[3] This paper is an official statement of position prepared with the approval of the Secretaries of State and Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff as a briefing paper for the President in his discussions with Churchill. An attached cover sheet, not printed, states that "It is now approved at the official level."

PROBABLE POSITION OF THE U.K.

The United Kingdom agrees with the United States that the Middle East Command cannot be activated until after Turkey (and Greece) has been admitted into NATO[4] and until after a satisfactory command arrangement under SACEUR has been worked out. Furthermore, the United Kingdom and the United States agree that the commander of the Middle East Command should be British. The U.K. desires a British General in command of the MEC and of the Eastern Command of SACEUR and prefers that he be the same person, wearing two hats. Further, the British wish to obtain an agreement now to the relationship between the two commands (we are only committed to a U.K. commander for the MEC). Until the British wishes are fulfilled the U.K. is not inclined to take preparatory steps toward the establishment of the Middle East Command.

Position to be presented: (On U.S. initiative)

The United States Government attaches great importance to the establishment of the Middle East Command and we hope it will be possible to establish it formally about March or April, 1952. All the details of the Middle East Command can't be worked out and it cannot be established until Greece and Turkey have entered NATO and full agreement has been reached on their relationship to General Eisenhower's command. While establishment of MEC must not be permitted to interfere with or delay admission of Greece and Turkey into NATO, there is no reason why preliminary work on the Middle East Command shouldn't get under way immediately. I think representatives of the sponsoring powers and the Commonwealth nations should hold meetings in Washington on this in the near future. Of course, if it is militarily and politically feasible to effect the simultaneous establishment of the Middle East Command and NATO Command arrangements for Greece and Turkey, we should be glad to see this done.

With regard to the area of the Middle East Command we expect it to include the Arab States, Israel, the independent Arab Sheikdoms and Iran.

There are several problems relating to the Middle East Command which we are going to have to think about. Israel, for example, requires special attention. It's going to be hard to keep Israel's interest up and at the same time delay the invitation to Israel until it is politically practical. We must also consider at some stage the possibility of widening the area of the Middle East Command to include Pakistan. Clearly, we have to give special consideration to Turkey's views on the Middle East Command, since we want Turkey to play as active a role as possible.

As you know, the United States supports the proposal of a British General in charge of the Middle East Command. We cannot ourselves consider at this time any further extension of military commitments in the Middle East, and our participation does not involve the commitment of troops. United States participation will be limited to participation in the integrated command staff and to the provision of some military aid.

While we can have preliminary discussions on the Middle East Command, I think the most urgent thing is to press forward as rapidly as possible to complete action on bringing Greece and Turkey into NATO, and to work out their relationship to the NATO Command structure. Only when this is done and the Middle East command has been organized, and after consultation with all interested parties (including NATO), will it be possible to determine what relationships will be appropriate between the two commands. Of course, we cannot integrate the non-NATO command in the Middle East into the NATO command structure.

Just a final word on this question and that is with regard to British troops and bases in Egypt. I am sure you will agree that it would not be politically possible to place those troops and bases under MEC until Egypt accepts the MEC proposals.

DISCUSSION

The British may balk at our proposal to proceed rapidly with the Middle East Command until they receive full assurance that the United States agrees to a British Commander for NATO Eastern flank command as well as for the Middle East Command. A further cause for British delay may be their desire that the same British General hold both of these commands. The Middle East Command is important to the achievement of our political objectives in the Middle East and delay in its establishment will further prejudice the Western political position in that area.

1. Middle East Command

At the President's invitation Mr. Churchill opened the discussion.

Mr. Churchill said that he wanted to make clear the current position of the UK in the Middle East. This position has been deeply altered by the disappearance of the Indian Army as a British military instrument as a result of Indian independence. Of course, UK communications with Australia and New Zealand remain always possible around the Cape but this is a long and inefficient route.

[1] These minutes were drafted by Knight on Jan. 9. This meeting was the third in a series of four held by the President and the Prime Minister on Jan. 7 and 8. A joint communiqué by the two leaders, giving a brief account of the meetings, was issued as a press release by the White House on Jan. 9. (Department of State Bulletin, Jan. 14, 1952, p. 83) For further documentation on Prime Minister Churchill's visit, see volume. VI, Part 1.

The Prime Minister then briefly referred to the current difficulties in Iran;[2] mentioned the unstable situation in the Near Eastern countries and referred to Israel over which the British have no control. Turning to Egypt,[3] he said that the UK was there to perform solely an international duty by keeping the Canal open for international trade. More traffic is going through the Canal now than ever before. British forces are not in the area for promoting in any manner British imperialist interests. As the British are performing an international task in the Canal Zone, the burden cannot be left indefinitely on their shoulders alone. According to the Prime Minister the US proposal for a four-power pact (i.e., UK–US–French–Turkish sponsorship of the MEC) is the best thought to date in relation to this area and the UK wishes to support it in every way. The sooner the four-power proposal is implemented, the better. Referring to the MEC, Mr. Churchill declared that the Turks would be more likely to participate wholeheartedly if they were directly under General Eisenhower's command within NATO. He then referred to the importance of the US sending a symbolic brigade to the Suez Canal area and stressed the great importance of the four powers all sending token forces to this area. He thought that such a proof of solidarity should bring the difficulties with Egypt very quickly to an end. He said that the Egyptian situation was tying up British forces badly needed in Europe and elsewhere, that the UK was completely unprotected, and that he was most anxious to redeploy UK forces now in Egypt where they would be more useful. Hence the importance of the four powers sending token forces to Egypt which would quickly adopt a reasonable attitude when faced with such a common front. Concerning the Middle East Command itself, he said that, should the US so desire, the UK would be willing to appoint a British Commander for the MEC. Indeed, he thought that this would be natural in view of the size of the British forces in the area and of the task which they are now performing. Nevertheless, he wanted to make quite clear the UK did not desire or expect national benefits therefrom and re-emphasized that the British are only discharging an international duty, and a most painful one, in the Canal Area. Mr. Churchill also stressed that a British commander of the MEC must not be considered as compensation for British "losses" elsewhere (i.e., the MEC is not part of any quid pro quo).

Mr. Eden then referred to the command set-up itself and to the talks thereon between France, the UK and US in Rome.[4]

Mr. Acheson mentioned the political factors involved. He said that it is most important politically to move forward with the establishment of the MEC. Obviously, Greece and Turkey would have to be full members of NATO before this could be complete. [5] However, the US is most eager to work closely with the British and French so that the MEC can be set up by March or April. With reference to NATO command arrangements for Greece and Turkey, they would have to be separate from the MEC. At one time the US had thought that the two-hat concept would be possible with the same officer commanding both the MEC and the Eastern Command of NATO. Now the US has come to the conclusion that such an arrangement could not work and that the NATO command must be quite separate and distinct from the MEC.

Mr. Lovett concurred in Mr. Acheson's statement.

General Bradley then said the US Joint Chiefs of Staff thought that, all things considered, the best way of placing Greece and Turkey in the NATO Command framework would be through the extension of Admiral Carney's command to include these two countries. From the military point of view it would be better to set up a fourth command under General Eisenhower but, in view of Greece's and Turkey's stand, for political reasons, the Joint Chiefs of Staff thought the easiest and most practical solution resided in extending Admiral Carney's command. At a later date should it become apparent that Admiral Carney is over-extended, it ought to be possible to split his command.

Field Marshal Slim declared that the UK Chiefs agreed with General Bradley. The proposed arrangement would indeed place too large a military burden on Admiral Carney but there seemed to be no alternative to accepting General Bradley's proposal in view of the position of Greece and Turkey. In case of war this command structure would have to be immediately changed. Field Marshal Slim then pointed out that, regardless of the intense interest of the Turks in being recognized as a European power, it was a fact which no one could change that they were geographically situated in the Middle East. Turkey is the only country in the Middle East which can make a real contribution to the MEC and a proper link between the MEC and Admiral Carney's command must be established. Furthermore, a proper Turkish contribution to the MEC must be obtained. He did not think there would be any trouble on the latter score in view of the assurances received from the Prime Minister and Defense Minister of Turkey by General Bradley and himself when they visited Ankara last fall. He then proposed as the link between the MEC and Admiral Carney that the "Commander of the Turkish Front" also be the deputy to the MEC Commander or, he added "something of that nature".

[5] For documentation, see vol. v, Part 1, pp. 107 ff. and Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. III, Part 1, pp. 460 ff.

General Bradley declared that he agreed with everything Field Marshal Slim said excepting that he did not agree with the NATO Commander in Turkey holding any position in the MEC. The US could not accept this suggestion as it saw nothing but trouble in the two-hat concept. He proposed that we should see later what can be worked out. For the time being the two commands should be kept entirely distinct as otherwise there would be objections not only from Greece and Turkey but also "on the Northern flank".

2. Coordination of US–UK Policies in the Middle East: Egypt and Iran

After saying that it was vital that the UK and the US understand each other on all these matters, the President asked Mr. Acheson to speak.

Referring to Egypt, the Secretary of State said that he and Mr. Eden had discussed this situation at some length Saturday night on the Williamsburg[6] and that he expected to have other talks with Mr. Eden while he was here. The prime purpose of these talks would be to work out a new four-power approach to Egypt. In view of the importance which the King of Egypt places on the matter this new approach should include his recognition as King of the Sudan. However, before granting this recognition to the King of Egypt, it would be necessary to assure ourselves of certain conditions beforehand. The King would have to agree to self-determination of the Sudan and to refrain from upsetting any Sudanese regime. He also would have to agree beforehand to accept the four-power proposal concerning the MEC. Althrough not mentioned as a pre-condition, Mr. Acheson said that the King of Egypt should cooperate in dispelling the existing misconceptions in Egypt concerning the nature of the original four-power proposal. He expressed confidence that he could reach agreement with Mr. Eden as to the course of action to be followed by [but] that it was not clear as to the best moment for breaking the present deadlock.

Mr. Eden stated that he agreed with much that Mr. Acheson had said. However, the King of Egypt does not want the four powers to move now. He thought it was very important to make it quite clear that there had been full agreement at this meeting on the line which should be pursued by the US and UK in relation to Egypt and that this might so influence the Egyptian Government that it might advance the date when a new four-power proposal could advantageously be made. According to the British Foreign Secretary, the main complication for the UK in recognizing King Farouk as King of the Sudan lay in the fact that such recognition would be generally interpreted throughout Egypt as British acceptance of the abrogation of the Treaty of 1899 and of the resulting condominium over the Sudan. To make possible British recognition of King Farouk as King of the Sudan it would first be necessary for the Egyptians to return to the terms of the Treaty of 1899 and abide thereby.

[6] President Truman, Churchill, Eden, Acheson, and staff members held a conference aboard the presidential yacht Williamsburg on Saturday evening, Jan. 5, at which a large number of matters were briefly discussed. A set of notes dictated by General Bradley, dated Jan. 10, is in the Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 100. A memorandum attached to the notes reads: "General Bradley asked me to inform you that these notes are sketchy and are by no means complete."

Mr. Chruchill then stressed the importance of making fully clear in the communiqué UK-US agreement as to the policy to be followed in relation to Egypt.

Mr. Eden added that it would also be helpful if the communiqué made it crystal clear that the US and the UK had made up their minds to proceed vigourously with the establishment of the MEC. This should have many beneficial effects throughout the Middle East area.

Mr. Truman requested Mr. Acheson to pursue his talks with Mr. Eden concerning Egypt and then referred to his grave worries over the Iranian situation.

Mr. Eden spoke about the current negotiations between the International Bank and the Iranian Government and questioned the recent unfavorable answer from Mosadeq. However, he understands that the Bank intends to continue negotiations and will answer Mosadeq's questions. Mr. Eden had seen the Bank's representatives and the UK is entirely willing to have the Bank continue to play the hand which has been started. For the time being at least, there is no doubt that the right thing to do is to carry on with the procedure which has been initiated. However, Mr. Eden expressed doubts as to the chances of success. He added that the UK was fully ready to examine anything else which might bring the US and the UK in closer harmony with regard to Iran. In his opinion, the price of oil was the essence of current negotiations and US-UK agreement on this subject would be necessary before these negotiations could succeed.

Secretary Acheson said it would be very helpful if Mr. Eden would work on this subject with US officials while he was in Washington. He thought that the Bank needed help both on procedure and on substance. He then commented on the conspiratorial manner in which it was necessary to deal with Mosadeq and to the latter's idiosyncrasies which seem to center largely around his fear that he would be considered in Iran as "having sold out to the West". Referring to the Iranian situation as a whole, Mr. Acheson expressed the conviction that it was necessary to introduce a new element of substance without delay as the old proposals were now worn out and were discarded automatically by Mosadeq as soon as mentioned.

Mr. Snyder raised the point of how the International Bank would be able to withdraw from its position as a trustee for oil funds under the scheme now being discussed between the Bank and the Iranian Government. He said that, while it would be a simple matter for the Bank to accept this responsibility, it might be very difficult for the Bank to withdraw from it.

Mr. Eden made the point that, while the Labor Government had taken the position that it refused to negotiate further with the Iranian Government, the New British Government, on the contrary, has expressed its desire to negotiate. However, if the Iranian Government remains obdurate, there will have to be some change in our approach to the Iranians as has been the case for Egypt.

Mr. Churchill stressed that close US-UK cooperation in the Middle East should "divide the difficulties by ten".

The President declared that US-UK agreement was necessary for any settlement of Middle Eastern problems.

Mr. Churchill said that the cards had now been laid on the table, that Mr. Eden and Mr. Acheson could proceed privately and perhaps he and the President might discuss the Middle East again, and in particular, the Iranian situation when he returned from Canada next week.

[Here follows discussion of matters of common concern in Asia.]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 15, 1952.

Subject: Turkish Views on the NATO Command Relationship

Participants: Mr. Feridun C. Erkin, Turkish Ambassador
Mr. Burton Y. Berry, Acting Assistant Secretary, NEA
Mr. C. Robert Moore, GTI

Ambassador Erkin called on Mr. Berry today to discuss with him the Truman-Churchill conversations with particular reference to the Middle East area. Mr. Berry emphasized that the talks had been helpful, that the purpose had not been to take up specific issues and to reach specific agreements, but simply to have a discussion of problems of common concern and with the idea that this would contribute to finding ways in which solutions to problems could be advanced.

With specific reference to the Middle East, Mr. Berry commented that Iran and Egypt had been the principal subjects of discussion. At the meetings the hope was expressed that the IBRD efforts to reach a solution to the Iranian oil problem would be successful. In Egypt the problem is very serious. We continue to base our confidence in the offer contained in the four power approach of last autumn. We plan to move ahead with the other powers in establishing the Middle East Command, believing that when something specific has been created, the Middle Eastern countries will be more inclined to give favorable consideration to participation. We believe the principles of the Middle East Command are good and that the Middle Eastern states eventually will recognize that they are in accord with their own interests.

Ambassador Erkin then asked whether the Command arrangements with respect to Turkey had been discussed. Mr. Berry said that the subject had come up. He added that he understood that the British Government had informed the Turkish Government that it agreed that Turkey should fall under SACEUR. Ambassador Erkin confirmed that Sir Knox Helm, the British Ambassador, had so informed the Foreign Minister several days ago. This he felt was a very desirable development.

The Ambassador referred to another aspect of the Command problem. Some time ago General Grigoropoulos, in discussing with the Standing Group Greek views on the Command organization, had stated that Greece favored an extension of the Carney Command to include Greece. When asked if there was not some alternative arrangement that would be satisfactory, he mentioned the creation of a fourth command under SACEUR. Subsequently Admiral Ulusan outlined the Turkish view which also envisaged the extension of the Carney Command. Admiral Wright had then asked for Admiral Ulusan's views on the idea of a fourth command. The latter immediately consulted Ankara (Ambassador Erkin was on leave at the time). The Foreign Office cabled the Ambassador that it would accept the idea of a fourth command. However, he felt from the tone of the telegram that the Turkish acceptance was based on the belief that the United States favored such an alternative. On the Ambassador's instructions, Admiral Ulusan informed Admiral Wright confidently that Turkey would accept the idea of a fourth command, but with great reluctance. At Admiral Wright's suggestion he also informed General Bradley and the Chief of Naval Operations. General Bradley had replied that he was well aware of the Turkish views and had no intention of forcing any solution on the Turks which they could not find acceptable.

Ambassador Erkin then commented to Mr. Berry that entirely apart from the creation of a fourth command under SACEUR was the question of the "personality" of the Commander. He personally felt that the power contributing the greatest strength to the Command should furnish the Commander. In other words, the country supplying the Commander should have more than simply the "personality" to offer. The matter was not pursued further as it was accepted that the problem of Command arrangements seemed to be proceeding along satisfactory lines towards a solution.

Subsequent to his visit with Mr. Berry, Ambassador Erkin called Mr. Moore to advise him that he had just received a telegram from Ankara confirming that the Turkish Government's indicated willingness to accept a fourth command under SACEUR stemmed from its belief that the United States had favored such a proposal. The Turkish Government still adheres very strongly to its original position that Admiral Carney's Command should be extended to include Greece and Turkey and would accept the other alternative with great reluctance. He further commented on his statement with respect to the "personality" of the Commander. He wanted to make clear that he had not meant to imply that a Turk should be appointed as Commander of a fourth Command. He felt this would be as unacceptable to the Greeks as a Greek Commander would be to the Turks. He had in mind that an American would be the most logical choice.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Kopper)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 31, 1952.

Subject: British Views on the Early Establishment of the MEC.

Participants: Mr. Bernard A. B. Burrows, Counselor, British Embassy.
Mr. Denis Greenhill, First Secretary, British Embassy.
Mr. F. W. Marten, First Secretary, British Embassy.
Mr. Burton Y. Berry, Acting Asst. Secretary, NEA.

Mr. G. Lewis Jones, Acting Deputy Asst. Secretary, NEA.
Mr. Harold B. Hoskins, Regional Planning Adviser, NEA.
Mr. Alexander B. Daspit, Politico-military Adviser, NEA.
Mr. John H. Ferguson, Deputy Director, S/P.
Mr. Francis L. Spalding, Intelligence Adviser, RA.
Mr. Samuel K. C. Kopper, Acting Director, NE.

Representatives of the British Embassy called on Mr. Berry this afternoon to inform the Department of the most recent British views regarding the establishment of the Middle East Command. Mr. Burrows said that the Foreign Office now believed that it was time to get along with the establishment of the MEC. He then distributed the two attached memoranda [1] which he said represented the latest thinking. He pointed out, however, that these papers had been prepared before the new government of Ali Maher Pasha had taken over in Egypt. [2]

Mr. Burrows said that the UK now believed: (1) there was no further obstacle to setting up MEC now that Greece and Turkey were just about in NATO; (2) it was necessary to get on with MEC if the Middle East countries were to take it seriously. There were points of tactics which remained to be settled such as the type of organization to be set up; timing of meetings; when to talk to the Turks, etc. The French Government was also being informed of the British views now. Finally, the UK thought that it would be a good idea to have a meeting of the sponsoring powers in London in the first part of March immediately after the NATO Lisbon meeting. [3]

Mr. Berry said that he was glad to see that there were proposals to get ahead with the MEC. He observed that we might have to talk with the Turks earlier. Mr. Burrows envisaged informing the Turks before Lisbon. Mr. Jones wondered whether the British had given thought to the possibility of Egypt joining in the post-Lisbon meeting. Mr. Ferguson believed that we ought to consider getting Egypt in if it was at all possible. Mr. Burrows said that several of these points had occurred to the British Embassy here. They had already made them known to London.

[1] The attached memoranda comprise one part of a British diplomatic-military approach to the U.S. Government. Also, on Jan. 31, the British Air Chief Marshal sent a letter to Gen. Omar Bradley concerning the establishment of a Middle East Command. For a summary of the letter, see footnote 2, Document 64.

[2] For documentation regarding the fall of the Wafd government following the Jan. 26 riots in Cairo, see Document 956 ff.

[3] For documentation on the Lisbon meeting, see vol. v, Part 1, pp. 107 ff.

Mr. Ferguson asked whether the MEC would have arms supply functions. Mr. Greenhill replied that this was to be left to the tripartite coordinating organization which would have the coordinating powers. Eventually it might be absorbed in MEC. There ensued a discussion as to when the Turks should be informed. Mr. Jones and Mr. Kopper felt that it ought to be as soon as possible. Mr. Marten thought that the three powers should first get their views in order. Mr. Berry said that it was essential that this be done before Lisbon.

Mr. Jones asked whether the Commonwealth would be in on the London meeting. Mr. Marten replied that the Commonwealth would be kept informed in the same way the Turks were being informed. Mr. Jones asked what sort of representation the British would expect at the London meeting. Mr. Burrows said that reasonably high representation on both the politico and military side. While the discussions would be secret, it would be no secret that the meetings were taking place. Mr. Spalding questioned whether London was the best place to hold the meeting. He suggested Cyprus. Mr. Jones inquired by inference about Washington. Mr. Burrows repeated that the British hoped it would be in London.

Mr. Hoskins said that we should keep the Arab States in mind and not do anything which was going to make our selling of the MEC more difficult. Mr. Burrows said this was a good point which they would keep in mind as well as the desirability of having Egypt join in the talks.

MIDDLE EAST COMMAND

Since the summer of 1951 the United States and the United Kingdom have been agreed in principle on urging the desirability of setting up a Supreme Allied Command in the Middle East.

2. In November 1951 the Governments of France, Turkey, U.K. and the U.S., with the knowledge and support of the Governments of Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, published proposals for the establishment of an Allied Middle East Command.

3. These proposals had been submitted to the Egyptian Government before publication with the suggestion that Egypt should join with the other four Powers in sponsoring them. The Egyptian Government refused to have anything to do with the proposals. After the Egyptian refusal, the four Powers re-affirmed their intention to establish the Command.

4. It has been necessary to defer action until now so that the relationship of Greece and Turkey to the NATO command structure could be determined. Now that this issue is on a fair way to settlement by the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO under SHAPE, and leaving aside the question of Egyptian participation, the time has come to consider what practical steps can be taken in the immediate future and to discuss what form the embryo organisation should take. It may not be opportune at this time to set up a Supreme Allied Headquarters of a fully operational nature such as SHAPE and SACLANT but the British Government urges that first steps towards the establishment of the Command on the lines of the attached memorandum be taken forthwith.

5. Air Chief Marshal Sir William Elliot is giving copies of the attached memorandum to General Bradley and General Ely. His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris is informing the Quai D'Orsay of the nature of the steps suggested in the memorandum. We would like to obtain the general agreement of the U.S. and French Governments to our suggestions, so that we can also approach the Turks and the Commonwealth countries concerned.

6. We realise that the Turks may hesitate to join in any discussions about the organisation of the Middle East Command until they have been finally admitted to NATO and are certain of their position under SHAPE. We would therefore propose that the politico-military talks in London should not begin until after the Atlantic Council Meeting in Lisbon.

7. Our idea is that the Council should agree that Turkey and Greece should form part of Admiral Carney's Southern Command and should pass a resolution to this effect to come into force automatically on their entry into NATO. This should go a long way to meet Turkey's fear that she will be side-tracked into the Middle East Command before her position in NATO is firm. At the same time we would propose that Turkey should receive formal assurances on this point from the three Standing Group powers. The effect of these assurances would be that Turkey's position in relation to the Middle East Command would be identical with that of the United States, France and ourselves, i.e. Turkey would be a full member of NATO who, by reason of her non-NATO interests, had decided to collaborate with other NATO powers in making arrangements for the defense of the Middle East. We should hope that the effect of these assurances would be to obtain Turkey's agreement to start discussion on the Middle East Command immediately after Lisbon.

8. If agreement is reached in time for an announcement to be made at the Lisbon meeting of the North Atlantic Council, the sponsoring powers could meet in London early in March to take the first steps toward establishment of a Middle East Command.

9. We should be glad to have the views of the United States Government on this proposal.

SECRET [WASHINGTON, January 31, 1952.]

ALLIED MIDDLE EAST COMMAND

1. The United Kingdom believes that there should be no further delay in taking the first steps to establish the Middle East Command. It may not yet be opportune to set up a fully operational command and headquarters, but nevertheless the need for coordinated planning is as great as ever, if not more so.

2. We are still anxious that Egypt should participate in the Command arrangements. Irrespective of the decision on this question, we feel, however, that it is now necessary to proceed with the preliminary steps. With this end in view the United Kingdom proposes that there should be a meeting of the Four Powers concerned in the Declaration and the interested Commonwealth countries, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

3. Subject to the agreement of the powers concerned, it is suggested that the Conference should be held in London in early March, soon after the conclusion of the Lisbon NATO meetings, and that an announcement to this effect should be made at Lisbon.

4. The United Kingdom's views on a possible Command Organisation and its functions are outlined below.

THE MIDDLE EAST COMMAND ORGANISATION (MECO)

5. The aim should be to set up a nucleus Middle East Command Organisation, outside NATO, in accordance with the principles set out in the Quadripartite Declaration, which would be an effective Planning Organisation for planning the defence of the Middle East in war.

6. Since it seems unlikely that the Headquarters of such an organisation can be in Egypt under present conditions, the United Kingdom is prepared to offer Cyprus for the purpose. This would be without prejudice to the eventual location of the headquarters of the Middle East Command Organisation.

7. The first stage of the Command should be as a planning, coordinating, and liaison organisation only, rather on the lines of the early Western Union organisation at Fontainbleau. It should, nevertheless, be called and be organised as a Command Headquarters since, should war occur before MECO has progressed beyond this embryo stage, it would provide an immediate basis for expansion to a Supreme Command Organisation.

8. Later the Command should evolve in accordance with paragraph 11 of the Paris Declaration into a fully fledged integrated Allied Command with forces assigned or earmarked. It is impossible, in present circumstances, to estimate when this state of development might be reached, nor is it necessary to consider the matter at this stage, except insofar that the basic organisation must allow for such eventual progress.

9. There should be no Forces placed under the Allied Command until the organisation has taken shape and the present unsettled situation in the Middle East is resolved or greatly improved. Nor at this stage should the Head of the organisation be called a Supreme Commander but something on the lines of Chairman of MECO and Supreme Commander designate.

FUNCTIONS OF MECO

10. The functions of the Command must follow closely those outlined in the Paris Declaration and should be:—

a. To be a centre of cooperative efforts for Defence of the Middle East as a whole (para. 3 of the Declaration).

b. Planning and providing the Middle East States on their request with assistance in the form of advice and training (para. 5).

c. The coordination of requests by Middle East States for arms and equipment (para. 5).

d. To make plans for the operations in War of all Forces within or to be introduced into the area (para. 6) and to coordinate them with the operations of the adjoining NATO Command in the Eastern Mediterranean and Asia Minor.

e. To initiate the Middle East Defence Liaison Organisation which is to be the link between the MECO and Countries ready to join in the Defence of this area (para. 7).

f. To reduce such deficiencies as exist at present in the organisation and capacity for defence in the area (para. 10).

HIGHER DIRECTION OF MECO

11. Middle East Command Organisation will require some form of Higher Direction in the political, military and supply spheres. Broadly these might take shape as follows.

12. Political: The method of conveying political guidance to the Command requires further consideration.

13. Military: There should be a Middle East Military Committee consisting initially of representatives of the seven sponsoring powers, but it would appear that some smaller body, for instance a Steering Committee, will probably be necessary.

14. Logistics: The supply of arms must, at present, come from U.S., U.K. and France. This sphere may conflict with NATO and should thus be closely allied to it. The proposed tripartite arms agency for the Middle East could be dovetailed into the NATO organisation for coordination of supply and production.

COORDINATION WITH ADJACENT COMMANDS

15. It will be for MECO, when established to evolve the arrangements for operational coordination between the Command and the adjacent Allied Commands. In the case of adjoining NATO Commands in the Mediterranean this will have to be resolved between the Chairman of MECO and SACEUR.

The Ambassador in Turkey (McGhee) to the Department of State

SECRET ANKARA, February 5, 1952—4 p. m.

710. Brit Amb advised me that London has proposed to Washington and Paris that Turk and Greece be brought into NATO under Carney and that Turk wld be told at same time that they wld be expected make contribution to MEC and that mtg wld be held in London immed after their entry into NATO for purpose moving forward with org of command. FonOff advises him that Dept reaction favorable. I assume Dept will, of course, advise me fully before any final decisions are taken in this matter. We wld in particular wish to know more as soon as Turk can be officially advised that she will be admitted to NATO under Carney. Arnold advised me today of JC's decision on this question which, I assume, now only awaits final action SG. We wld also like be able prior to agreement by other three powers discuss with Turks question of MEC mtg.

Brit Amb here is almost as concerned as I, as I have expressed in recent telegrams, of tendency London seek agreement with US and even France on MEC matters to be presented to Turks as fait accompli. He is, of course, aware of grave suspicion that exists here with respect to MEC and fact that whole-hearted Turk participation in MEC, which is gen unpopular both in govt and private circles, will require very delicate handling. I strongly urge that there be no US-UK or US-UK-Fr agreement on mtg or any other MEC matter without prior consultation with Turks. I urge that Turks be advised that there wld be no formal MEC discussions until after their entry into NATO and that four powers will then consult as equals as to next steps to be taken. I hope that Dept will in future keep us better advised with respect to MEC developments. To date I have recd nothing to indicate progress of US-UK or SG discussions and am embarrassed by fact that I have recd no reply to Embtel 671, Jan 26,[1] making it impossible discuss MEC with FonMin as agreed. I hope that GTI will follow MEC developments with same interest as NE. MEC cannot be successfully developed on basis private deals between US and Brit. We can only assure Turk coop if they are in fact, as well as in name treated as equal partner in development of MEC concept and org.

(7) Brit memo states further consideration required Higher Direction MECO in polit, mil, and logistical spheres: (a) polit—discussions re method conveying polit guidance to cmd; (b) mil–ME mil comite consisting initially reps seven sponsoring powers; may have to form smaller Steering Comite; (c) logistical—supply of arms from US, UK and France may conflict with NATO, so shld be closely allied through dovetailing tripartite arms agency with NATO orgs coordinating supply production. (8) MECO shld evolve arrangements for operational coordination with adjacent NATO cmds. Substance Brit memo ends.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Greek, Turkish, and Iranian Affairs (Dorsz)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 7, 1952.[1]

Subject: Middle East Command

Participants: Mr. B. A. B. Burrows, Counselor, British Embassy.
Mr. D. A. Greenhill, First Secretary, British Embassy.
Mr. G. Lewis Jones, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, NEA.
Mr. Edmund J. Dorsz, Deputy Director, GTI.

Mr. Jones handed to Mr. Burrows a copy of the attached memorandum entitled Middle East Command saying that we thought this was a good method of imparting our views on the two memoranda which the British handed to the Department on January 31.[2] He emphasized our thinking to the effect that the British should unilaterally inform the Turks at the earliest possible moment of the British views on this subject and stressed the desirability of the Four MEC sponsoring Powers sharing thoughts on the question of holding a "preliminary" working-level meeting. Any such meeting should be quietly held. There might be other "preliminary meetings". Developments in Egypt would have to govern whether a meeting might be held shortly after the forthcoming Lisbon North Atlantic Council meeting ends.

Mr. Jones expressed the thought that the British might advisedly ask the Turks for their views and suggestions with regard to the best way of bringing the Egyptians into such discussions as may be undertaken to launch the MEC organization.

Mr. Jones remarked that we were very fortunate in having Mr. McGhee at Ankara. He is very familiar with the Middle East Command question having closely handled every aspect of this matter from its inception until his departure from the Department last month. Further, Mr. McGhee is deeply interested in getting the Middle East Command underway at the earliest feasible time and in obtaining fullest possible Turkish participation in the endeavor. The British representatives acquiesced.

The British representatives indicated that their own personal reaction to most of the points in our memorandum was favorable. They would communicate our thoughts on an urgent basis to the Foreign Office and would let us know how the Foreign Office reacts. In the meantime, they thought it might be advisable to defer informing the French of our views unless the French should specifically ask us for our observations on the British approach.

SECRET [WASHINGTON, February 6, 1952.]

MEMORANDUM

MIDDLE EAST COMMAND

1. U.S. welcomes British initiative in connection with the Middle East Command as set forth in the two British Memoranda handed the Department on January 31. The U.S. favors the UK suggestion for the inclusion of Greek and Turkish forces in Admiral Carney's command. It is in general agreement with British ideas regarding the importance of coordinated planning for the establishment of the Middle East Command which initially might not be a fully operational command.

[3] A Feb. 6 memorandum from Berry to Matthews, drafted by Jones, noted that this memorandum was prepared after two meetings on Feb. 5. The first was a meeting held in NEA at which RA, BNA, NE, GTI, and S/P presented their views, and the second was a discussion in Matthews' office later in the day. No memoranda of those conversations have been found in Department of State files.

The Feb. 6 memorandum asked Matthews to approve calling in Burrows of the British Embassy and giving him a copy of the attachment "as promptly as possible since we think the British should approach the Turks with their ideas in the near future." It also noted that Matthews was understood to have discussed the matter with General Bradley and that no further Defense clearance was required. Matthews wrote "I approve" in the margin. (780.5/2-652)

2. The U.S. recognizes that the establishment of the nucleus Middle East Command Organization (MECO) on Cyprus is a second best solution to its establishment with the concurrence of the Egyptian Government in the Suez base. The thoughts embodied in the British Memoranda were prepared before the Maher Government assumed office in Egypt.

3. The U.S. is aware of the danger of being too hopeful that Egypt will agree between now and Lisbon or within the next month or two to a defense arrangement along the lines of the Four Power Defense Proposals of last October. Nevertheless, the U.S. hopes that advantage will be taken of the present favorable prospects for resumed negotiations with Egypt with a view to the earliest possible solution on these lines.

4. Having in mind prospective negotiations with Egypt the U.S. doubts whether it is possible at this time to take a firm decision upon a forward program for a meeting in March since any such program would have to take full account of negotiations not yet begun. The U.S. would like to know whether U.K. views regarding the proposal in its memoranda have altered in any degree since Maher Pasha took office.

5. With regard to the British memoranda the U.S. wishes to make the following points:

a. We think that the U.K. should redraft their memoranda into a form suitable for delivery to the Turks by the U.K. at the earliest possible moment. We do not think that there is any advantage in this being a tripartite operation, as we understand the French Government has suggested. On the contrary, direct British action towards Turkey will emphasize Turkey's equality as a sponsor of MEC.

b. We think that an inherent difficulty in the plan proposed by the U.K. is that under present circumstances it would involve a meeting of the U.K., U.S., France, Turkey, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa to plan for the establishment of MED without the presence of any Middle East state or provision for any Arab state (except Egypt if it should wish to do so) or Israel to be consulted thus to gain a sense of participation. We feel, therefore, that it is politically important that any references to a meeting should describe it as "preliminary". The word "preliminary" would open an avenue for future meetings, preferably in the Middle East, at which the states in the area choosing to participate could be consulted.

c. We are inclined to think an announcement at Lisbon would be unwise. Difficulties and embarrassments might be avoided if there were no prior announcement of such a meeting. We think that the most desirable meeting to consider MECO would be one held very quietly at a working level. After it was over it could be announced that "a preliminary meeting has taken place". We think the less fanfare there is about the meeting the better and that we should bear in mind constantly the impact of knowledge of the meeting upon negotiations with Egypt.

6. In summary the U.S. suggests that:

a. The U.K. should proceed at once to inform the Turks of its ideas just as it has informed the U.S. and France.
b. The U.K. inaugurate discussions with Egypt as rapidly as circumstances permit.
c. That without attempting to decide now the time, place, or manner of announcement of a working level meeting to consider the embryo MECO, the U.K., U.S., France, Turkey, and the Commonwealth countries should collect their thoughts with a view to a prospective early meeting on this subject. In this connection the U.K. views set forth in its memorandum will be most helpful to the U.S.
d. Following the Lisbon meeting, and in the light of the status of Anglo-Egyptian negotiations at that time, the representatives of the U.S., U.K., France and Turkey (if Turkey is willing) should consult together and decide:

> (1) Whether a planning meeting re MECO is now desirable, and
> (2) If such a meeting is agreed upon, where, when and at what level it should take place. In the event of (2) the same representatives would decide what, if any, publicity is called for and the time of such publicity.

7. Essentially the U.S. fear is that if we move too far, too fast without Egypt while there remains a reasonable prospect of securing Egyptian cooperation, we may lessen our chances of arriving at a settlement with Egypt. Obviously, this idea cannot be carried too far, but we believe that at least between now and the Lisbon meeting we should retain the utmost flexibility.

The Secretary of Defense (Lovett) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, February 11, 1952.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of December 29, 1951 with regard to Organizing and Establishing the Middle East Command.[1]

I am in general agreement with your suggestions for the early establishment of a Middle East Command Headquarters. In this regard, it is desired to emphasize that it is the position of the Department of Defense that the establishment of a Middle East Command must not be allowed to jeopardize the accession of Greece and Turkey to the North Atlantic Treaty.

[1] For the Dec. 29 letter, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, p. 265.

The details of effecting coordination of effort between a Middle East Command and contiguous NATO commands cannot be determined until after Greece and Turkey are members of NATO. Any arrangements which would tend toward integration of the two commands (the British "two-hat" concept) should be opposed.

Your proposals to establish an informal State-Defense Working Group at this time to study the various problems connected with the establishment of a Middle East Command and to make recommendations for their resolution is concurred in. The Joint Chiefs of Staff will provide the Department of Defense representation on the Working Group.

Prior to the time that a United States position on the matter of the Middle East Command Headquarters is reached, I do not agree with your suggestion that the United Kingdom be informed of the establishment of the Working Group. When the United States position is reached, it is agreed to use Defense channels to advise the United Kingdom of this Working Group.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT A. LOVETT

Turkey in unique position assist solution Pushtoonistani issue. It was agreed Ambassador wld discuss these issues further with FonOff before arrival Pakistani Foreign Minister.

Ambassador expressed hope Pakistan wld ultimately adhere MEC, recalling indications he had recd from late Prime Minister and other Pakistani officials that they wld be actively interested once freed from threat of hostilities over Kashmir. Ambassador expressed belief that, while this still serious problem, it did not appear incapable of solution. We cld look forward to time when Pakistan wld make real contribution MEC bearing in mind had by far greatest military potential any country east of Turkey.

Ambassador observed that, in view close Pakistani-Iranian ties, Pakistan might be willing assist in defense Iran which appeared unable create any real defense capabilities. Prime Minister and Foreign Minister expressed interest this possibility, commenting if Pakistan and Turkey both exert conservative influence on Iran something may be done improve situation.

SECRET [Washington, March 4, 1952.]

Subject: Allied Middle East Command

1. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered the proposal contained in your letter to General of the Army Omar Bradley, SWE/20/52, dated 31 January 1952, [2] that a conference of

[1] This draft memorandum was enclosure A to a letter from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretary of State, not printed, dated Mar. 4. The letter requested Department of State concurrence on the draft prior to its despatch by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

A reply from Burton Berry to the Secretary of Defense, dated Mar. 7, not printed, stated that the Department of State was in general agreement with the position stated in the draft memorandum. (780.5/3-452) JCS records show that the memorandum was sent on March 18.

[2] Not printed. A copy of the letter was attached as enclosure B to the letter of Mar. 4. Elliot informed Bradley that the United Kingdom attached great importance to the establishment of a Middle East Command, but had not raised the point in the past few months in deference to the importance attached by the United States to the satisfactory admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO. The British Chiefs of Staff felt, however, that the time had come to reopen the question, and they had been considering, in consultation with the Foreign Office, the steps that the Sponsoring Powers be held in London in early March to conduct preliminary planning toward establishment of a Middle East Command Organization. They have also noted that, on 8 February 1952, the British Embassy advised the Department of State that the British Foreign Office agrees no attempt should be made at present to fix the date for the seven power meeting nor announcement made of intentions to hold the meeting. [3]

2. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff agree with the desirability for the early establishment of the Middle East Command; that, as a first step, the Middle East Command Headquarters should be established as soon as practicable; but that the proposed conference of interested countries should be held only after agreement thereto by the powers concerned, at a date to be determined later, but without public announcement of intention to hold such a conference.

3. The matter of effecting necessary coordination at all levels between the NATO and the Middle East Command, when the latter is established, must, of course, be subject to agreement by the North Atlantic Council.

4. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that the arms supply for the Arab States and Israel should be coordinated by the Tripartite Agency currently being discussed by the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France. [4] should be taken toward the establishment of a Middle East Command Organization. (780.5/3-452)

Included with the letter was a memorandum entitled "Allied Middle East Command," not printed, setting forth the way in which the United Kingdom envisaged the organization taking shape. The memorandum was almost identical to the second memorandum delivered by representatives of the British Embassy to the Department of State on Jan. 31, which is printed as Attachment II to the memorandum of conversation dated Jan. 31; see Document 58.

[3] See footnote 9, Document 60.

[4] This reference is to the Near East Arms Coordinating Committee (NEACC), which was being organized in the spring of 1952. Representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, and France met in Washington in March to consider proposals for the establishment in Washington of a three-power group to coordinate the supply of arms to the Arab states and Israel. (Memorandum of conversation, Mar. 19, 1952; 780.5/3-1952) A Department of State letter to the British and French Embassies, dated June 19, not printed, enclosed copies of the French and English texts of a document concerning the establishment of NEACC, in furtherance of the Tripartite Declaration of May 25, 1950. The committee was considered to have been constituted on June 4, 1952. (480.008/6-1952) Additional documentation on NEACC and later exchange of information among the three powers concerning arms assistance to Middle East countries is in Department of State files 340.280, 480.008, 780.5, and 786.56.

National Intelligence Special Estimate

[WASHINGTON, March 17, 1952.]

PROSPECTS FOR AN INCLUSIVE MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE ORGANIZATION[2]

THE PROBLEM

To examine the possibility of forming an inclusive Middle East defense organization; to estimate the kind of organization which may be possible; and to indicate the major problems which would be encountered in efforts to improve the effectiveness of such an organization. *

ESTIMATE

Present Status of The Middle East Command Proposal

1. The establishment of a Middle East defense organization was first proposed in October 1951, when the US, the UK, France, and Turkey invited Egypt to join with them as a founding member in setting up a Middle East Command (MEC). Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa had already agreed in principle to the concept of MEC. In November 1951, the sponsoring powers issued a supplementary statement informing Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, and Israel of the principles which they would follow in the establishment of MEC. By implication these

[1] File of National Intelligence Estimates maintained by the Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

[2] According to a note on the cover sheet, "The intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff participated with the Central Intelligence Agency in the preparation of this estimate. All members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 13 March 1952."

A memorandum by W. J. McWilliams, Director of the Executive Secretariat, to the Secretary of State, dated Mar. 19, not printed, explained that the Estimate did not readily lend itself to summarization, but the first section was a review of the status of the Middle East Command proposal. It reads, in part: "We suggest you begin reading on page 2 which discusses 'Prospects for Establishment of an Inclusive Middle East Defense Organization,' and continue through page 3. The Estimate was prepared at the request of the NSC Senior Staff." (780.5/3-1952) states would be invited to join the enterprise as associate members at a future time.

* While the Western Powers and Turkey may themselves establish a MEC, "an inclusive Middle East Command organization" is herein defined as one which obtains the active cooperation of most of the Middle Eastern countries. [Footnote in the source text.]

2. The stated objective of MEC was to strengthen the defenses of the Middle East through the cooperative effort of all states interested in its defense, whether or not territorially part of the area. Organizationally, MEC would consist of two bodies: (a) the command structure itself, including the Supreme Allied Commander Middle East and his staff; and (b) a Middle East defense liaison organization, in which all sponsoring and associate members would be represented and which would serve as a link between the command and all the member states. It was envisioned that the MEC organization would: (a) develop plans for operations in the area in time of war or international emergency; (b) provide advice, training and matériel to the Middle Eastern countries; and (c) arrange for use of facilities by MEC through specific agreements between MEC and the individual states providing such facilities It was stated that a continuing aim of MEC would be to increase the defense capabilities of the Middle Eastern countries in order to permit a proportionate reduction in the peacetime role of states not territorially part of the area. It was also stated that MEC would not interfere in problems and disputes arising within the area.

3. The sponsoring powers hoped that the MEC proposal would contribute to a compromise solution of the Anglo-Egyptian controversy. The Wafd government in Egypt, however, rejected the four-power proposal as an attempt to continue foreign occupation of Egyptian territory under a new guise. Practically all politically articulate elements in Egypt have approved of the government's position. King Farouk and the present Hilali government are more favorably disposed toward association with the West in regional defense, but even they demand prior acceptance of at least the principle of early and complete evacuation of British troops from Egyptian soil and recognition of Farouk's title as King of the Sudan as well as of Egypt.

4. Although a majority of the governmental leaders in the other Arab states have privately shown a marked interest in MEC, they do not feel that they have the political strength to run counter to local popular support for Egypt's position.

5. Although Israel has expressed its willingness to cooperate with the Western Powers in building up the defenses of the Middle East against Soviet aggression, it stated that it could not openly associate itself with the MEC proposal at this time.

PROSPECTS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INCLUSIVE MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE ORGANIZATION

6. A solution of the Anglo-Egyptian controversy is essential to the establishment of any inclusive Middle East defense organization. Egypt will not join until its controversy with the UK is settled, and under present circumstances no other Arab nation is likely to if Egypt does not.

7. A settlement of the Anglo-Egyptian controversy that would permit Egyptian participation in a Middle East defense organization would require British acceptance of at least the principle of early and complete evacuation of British troops from Egyptian soil and on British recognition of Farouk's title as King of the Sudan as well as of Egypt. Egypt probably will not reduce these demands.

8. If these demands were met, it is almost certain that Egypt would not accept a Middle East defense organization which included more than a nominal command structure or which provided for stationing of foreign ground forces in Egypt in peacetime. However, Egypt would probably join a defense organization if its function were limited to: (a) coordinating operational plans; (b) planning Western assistance to the Middle East states for the strengthening of their forces; and (c) negotiating for the development in peacetime, and the use in wartime of Middle East defense facilities. In this case, Egypt would probably agree to allow British or other Western technicians to remain in the Suez Canal Zone for maintenance of the bases. Egypt might also cooperate in the formation of an international air force in the Zone. However, Egypt would insist that all ground and air bases in the country be under Egyptian command.

9. If Egypt agreed to participate in a Middle East defense organization, the other Arab states would almost certainly be willing to participate. The chief motivation of all of these countries would be the hope of obtaining substantial amounts of arms, military equipment and economic aid from the Western Powers. They would also hope that the granting of such assistance would increase the likelihood of a serious Western effort to defend the area in the event of invasion from the USSR. Jordan, because of its economic dependence on the UK, would probably not insist on the withdrawal of British forces from its territory. Iraq, where nationalistic elements have so far been kept in check, would probably agree to join a Middle East defense organization. Syria and Lebanon would probably join, but would refuse to permit the stationing of foreign troops on their soil. King Ibn Saud would be willing to join a Middle East defense organization but would insist on preserving the special advantages in his relations with the US which he now enjoys. The leaders in all these countries and particularly Iraq are more aware of the threat of Soviet aggression than the Egyptians.

10. The multilateral character and specifically the four-power sponsorship of such a Middle East defense organization would be acceptable to Arab nationalists only because of the inclusion of the US. Arab nationalists would hope that US influence would counterbalance the influence of the UK and would insure generous treatment. Despite Arab suspicion that Israeli and Zionist pressures will influence US courses of action and that the US is committed to support the UK in its controversies with the Arab governments, there is an expectation that the US would supply arms and other aid to the Arab states without binding them by "unequal treaties" or interfering in their internal affairs. This does not mean that Egypt would accept the substitution of US for British forces on its territory or that any of the Arab states would be willing to accord to the US the type of administrative influence which the UK now exerts in Jordan and Iraq. It does, however, mean that the Arab states would prefer to obtain military and economic assistance from the US rather than from the UK or France and would prefer to deal with US advisors. Arab cooperation in any Middle East defense organization, therefore, would be likely to increase to the extent that the organization provided a means of increasing US aid to the region and reducing British and French influence therein.

11. It is doubtful that Israel could initially be included in a Middle East defense organization although Israel could probably be associated with the purposes of the organization through ties with the US and UK. In any case Israel would probably be unwilling to enter into any arrangement which involved furnishing military information to its Arab neighbors and would certainly oppose any increase in Arab military strength relative to its own. Moreover, Israel is reluctant to take any overt step calculated to alienate the USSR and thus eliminate all possibility of further Jewish emigration from the Soviet bloc.

PROBLEMS CONFRONTING A MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE ORGANIZATION

12. While settlement of the Anglo-Egyptian dispute would thus probably make possible the establishment of a regional defense organization capable of channelling Western military aid and advice to the Middle East states and of carrying out some preliminary defense planning and coordination, its development into a more broadly effective organization would remain an extremely difficult task.

13. Although the evacuation of British forces from Egypt would eliminate a major irritant in Arab-Western relations, Arab fears and suspicions and intraregional rivalries would continue to plague negotiations for development of an effective organization. Public opinion, as well as many leaders, would continue to underestimate, ignore, or be fatalistic about the threat of Soviet aggression, which they would regard as far less tangible than the question of Western "interference" or the Arab-Israeli dispute. Arab leaders would remain suspicious of Western motives, and would be concerned lest the defense organization be used as a means of applying collective pressure on them or re-establishing spheres of influence. Moreover, nationalist resentment against foreign interference in the Arab states might be turned against the regional defense organization, and lead to a demand for the withdrawal of foreign technicians from the Suez Canal base and other Middle East bases. In general, most states would remain motivated primarily by a desire to exploit Western fear of Soviet aggression in order to improve their military strength vis-à-vis their neighbors.

14. For the foreseeable future, effective defense of the Middle East against Soviet aggression is dependent upon the commitment of Western forces for that purpose, regardless of whether a Middle East defense organization is established or not. Over the longer term, an effective Middle East defense organization would require an improvement in Arab-Israeli relations, a lessening of the hostility of Arab nationalists to cooperation with the West, and the inducing of Arab states to give primary emphasis to the defense of the area against Soviet aggression.

SECRET ANKARA, March 31, 1952—8 p. m.

994. Section one of two.

1. Paris 5711, Mar 19, [2] London's 101, Mar 25, [3] Dept's 851 [4] and 852, Mar 25, [5] all contribute greatly to furtherance our common

[1] Transmitted in two sections. Repeated to Paris, London, and Damascus.

[2] Not printed; it reported a conversation between an Embassy officer and a member of the French Foreign Ministry on the general subject of military assistance to the Middle East. The last paragraph reads: "In FonOff attitude we feel that any suggestions to broaden tripartite declaration to include Turkey would meet with serious Fr objections. Despite obvious enthusiasm of Turks to cooperate with US, even to complete exclusion of Brit and Fr, we believe that policy of supplementing and not supplanting waning influence of our two old Allies in NE is right one. Under present Fr economic and polit circumstances we find it difficult to believe understanding difficult problem of four power cooperation in ME security matters. Paris 5711 particularly valuable for revealing real Fr position, London's 101 in giving perspective and Dept's reftels in clearly elucidating basic principles for four power coordination with which this Emb is in thorough accord. Inescapable fact emerges from all reftels that four power collaboration essential to achieve fundamental security objectives in ME.

While I agree with London's 101 that we shld not raise in MEC internal ME problems which can be avoided, I nevertheless feel that there are certain existing "facts of life" in ME which cannot be ignored if true cooperation is to be achieved. The success of our efforts to build in the ME a regional defense against external aggression will depend on our success in obtaining cooperation of individual ME states, which in turn involves their relations with four powers separately as well as collectively. Dept's 851 which faces squarely problem posed by Fr position in Syria and appeals for real four power cooperation transcending rivalries for ME spheres of influence, is welcome note.

2. In considering measures to strengthen ME cooperation we must keep in mind background of power relations in ME. The secret Anglo-French "non-substitution" agreement of Dec 13, 1945 provides that "the two govts affirm their intention to undertake nothing to supersede each other in the interests which they possess that French are in position materially to expand current modest role in NE or much less to embark on any dynamic policy." (740.5/3-1952)

[3] Not printed; it advised the Department of State the Embassy agreed some means should be found to eliminate local differences in the Middle East and make cooperation more effective, but was concerned with the wisdom of raising matters involving friction in individual countries. It suggested that the United States, as the most disinterested "go-between", should work quietly behind the scenes outside MEC to reconcile the special interest of the MEC partners in specific countries with the larger joint interest of security of the area as a whole. (780.5/3-2552)

[4] Not printed; it was a response to telegram 5711 from Paris. The Department of State suggested that if attempts to maintain national positions on a strictly national basis had been effective the Western powers would not be faced with the present difficulties in the Middle East, and unless the interested powers closed ranks and demonstrated a common front the Western position in the Middle East would further decline. It reads, in part: "We think Turkey is important element in 'new deal' approach to ME states. If we work on strictly US-UK-French basis it will be 'business as usual.' Whether it is too early for former Ottoman subjs welcome collaboration with Turks is matter for assessment. Fr doubts this score may have some validity but we think this decision is strictly up to Turks and Arabs."

[5] Not printed; it reported the Department of State was attracted by a proposal made by the Embassy in Turkey that the tripartite declaration of May 1950 be changed to a quadripartite basis by associating Turkey with it. It asked the Embassy to find out, without approaching the Turks, if Turkey would be interested in associating itself with the declaration to an extent which would justify informally approaching the United Kingdom and France through diplomatic channels with the idea. For documentation regarding the Tripartite Declaration, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. v, pp. 122 ff.

or in the responsibilities which they mutually recognize in the ME".[6] Agreement would appear to confirm respective Fr and Brit spheres of influence, particularly Fr position in Syria and Lebanon. Since agreement is presumably still in effect, it probably explains Brit–Fr reactions referred to in Damascus 37[7] which have constituted deterrent to four power cooperation there.

Basis of present US–UK cooperation in ME, which was initiated by Wright visit to US in 1948[8] is understood to be that US will not compete with or seek to displace Brit responsibilities or interests in ME, indeed, will seek to strengthen Brit where it can; however US does not recognize any exclusive UK spheres of influence and UK agrees desirability US make contribution over and above Brit contribution wherever it is in common interest. It is believed that Brit have lived up to this agreement. Altho they show natural desire protect interests, particularly in Jordan and Iraq, they have not opposed constructive contributions other powers in ME. Policy of Fr in recent years would appear however to seek to preserve special position in Syria and Lebanon even at expense progress these countries and four power cooperation there. Altho Fr understandably are not, in accordance with Paris 5711, in position extend assistance to Syria and Lebanon or pursue dynamic policy in ME, this would not appear to justify their consistent efforts prevent other powers make contributions where needed.

3. Following comment is made with ref to Fr (Paris 5711) doubts of Turk participation in milit assistance to Arab states because these countries against all outside powers. This includes of course US, particularly because of our participation in Palestine affair. There is probably some residual reaction against Turks remaining from Ottoman Empire; however, principal complaint ME countries at present is believed to be derived from Turk solidarity with Western Powers on ME questions. On imperialist grounds alone, Brit and French have had conflicts with ME Nationalist aspirations, which on occasions have involved actual warfare, more recently than demise of Ottoman Empire. In my discussions with Presidents of Syria and Lebanon approx year ago, they both emphasized that under no conditions would they permit entry of Fr troops into their countries either in peace or war.

With ref to present Turk position I have no evidence of desire by Turks to advance own special interests in ME at expense of Fr or anyone else. Turks withdrew from ME after World War I and have formally renounced any claim to territory or exclusive influence outside their present frontiers. Apart from isolated local ME reactions, which are believed revived mostly for polit reasons by Communists and opportunists, it is believed that ME countries now possess respect and growing confidence in Turks. Syrians have sent officers and noncoms to Turkey for training in recent years without apparent misgivings. Ultimate decision on acceptance aid from Turkey would in any event, as Dept comments, rest with Arab Govts themselves.

Section two of two.

4. I welcome Dept's recognition of Turkey as important element in "new deal" approach to ME states.[9] Association of Turkey, as a neighbor with strong ME ties and no justified suspicion of colonial intent, shld greatly assist in proving bona fides of other powers in MEC approach. Turkey is only significant mil power in ME and Turk army has given ME countries their only real basis of security in post-war period. With Turkey's admission to NATO and further build-up of mil strength Turk prestige in ME shld reach new high. Turks are in position moreover to make fol concrete contributions to ME defense:

(a) Since it is unlikely that Fr and US ground troops will be available for defense of MEC in event aggression and since Brit ME forces are unfortunately now pinned down in Egypt and Commonwealth troops long distance off, Turk troops are only ones available for land defense of ME. Turk troops are moreover located where they can be best utilized for ME defense, i.e., at the northern mountain line;

(b) Turks, with large efficient training schools organized with cooperation JAMMAT, are in unique position provide mil training for ME countries and are as matter of policy willing to do so. Participation in Turk training program of 638 US officers and NCO's assures latest US mil methods applicable ME and direct American influence on ME trainees. Training in Western countries would not only be much more expensive, but would raise new polit issues and would be under conditions so different from ME, that it would be difficult for trainees to make transition on return;

(c) In addition, Turks are in position now to sell arms to ME states and would, if we agreed replace them later, be in position to give arms. There is in Turkey considerable unused capacity for manufacture small arms and ammunition which could be used to supply ME states.

5. It is agreed that tripartite declaration is basically for internal ME problems and does not necessarily require discussion in MEC; however, declaration overlaps interests of MEC in that it involves policy with respect to arms shipments to ME states for area defense. I am pleased to note, therefore, Dept's interest in possible inclusion of Turkey in declaration.[10] Altho I have not put this matter to Turks directly I believe, from discussions I have had, that Turks would be willing associate themselves with declaration. FonOff officials have in fact expressed surprise that they were not originally consulted. Turks are convinced that assurance against aggression among ME states is necessary precedent to ME stability, and are willing, now that they are admitted to NATO, to play more positive role in ME. PriMin told me recently Turk Govt would take positive steps to gain confidence Arab States and allay their suspicions. Association with other powers in tripartite declaration may work against this objective; however, it will, it is believed, tend to relieve inference in minds ME states that declaration designed to protect Israel and affirm Western spheres of influence.

[9] This reference is to telegram 851 to Ankara, Mar. 25, which is summarized in footnote 4, above.

6. Summarizing I hope Dept will:

(a) Continue to press for sincere four power cooperation in ME security matters;

(b) Seek thru bilateral discussions with powers involved to overcome existing barriers to this cooperation including secret agmts or spheres of influence concepts;

(c) Sound out Brit and Fr and attempt to obtain their agreement to Turk adherence to tripartite declaration in preparation for approach to Turks and;

(d) As soon as Egyptian situation permits proceed with MEC mtg proposed by Brit, and seek to resolve in this mtg any remaining problems which stand in way of effective four power action.

Memorandum by the Acting Regional Planning Adviser, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Hoskins) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 7, 1952.

Subject: Re-appraisal of US Policies in the NEA Area.

All members of BOP—Office Directors and Staff Advisers—concur in the following statement.

Part I—Background Comments

(1) During the past year, as a result of a series of crises in the NEA area, there have been piecemeal re-appraisals of US policies relating to North Africa, Egypt, the Arab States and Israel, Iran and Kashmir.

(2) This memorandum is an effort to summarize the outstanding conclusions separately arrived at. It also permits us to appraise results to date and to suggest changes in policies which may be desirable for the future.

(3) Neither in the separate studies nor in this paper is there any intent to suggest an over-riding importance to any particular part of the NEA area as compared with any other Bureau. Clearly the "one world" concept of US policy must control and the problem is to fit NEA's problems into their correct relative global importance within the over-all framework of US policies and capabilities.

[1] This memorandum was sent to Byroade by Hoskins in his position as a member of the Board of Policy Planning (BOP), which, presumably, was an NEA board composed of Office Directors and Staff Advisers. The source text was in the Department of State files attached to a memorandum from Hoskins to Bruce, dated May 12, not printed. The May 12 memorandum suggested that if Bruce were too busy to read the whole paper, he at least read paragraph 14, "since this contains the suggestions for the mechanics needed to make progress on the issues and policies discussed earlier in this memorandum."

The memorandum continued: "Since coming down here I have been impressed with the delays and difficulties which result from unreconciled points of view within the Department. These differences in turn have handicapped the Department in working effectively with Defense and with other Departments of the Government as well as in some of our diplomatic negotiations with the UK and the French. So if you still agree on the necessity for greater agreement within the Department and especially between EUR and NEA, I hope you will urge Messrs. Matthews, Perkins and Byroade to adopt the procedure recommended in paragraph 14 of this memo." (611.80/5-1252)

On May 12, the memorandum printed here was transmitted to the Chiefs of Mission in the NEA area. Their comments, none printed, are in Department of State files 611.80 and 780.00. For a revision of this memorandum, dated July 25, see Document 81.

(4) The most immediate problem of US relations with Greece and Turkey has been resolved by their adherence to the North Atlantic Treaty.[2] Therefore, the further problems of these two countries will not be discussed in this paper. The general lines of US policy in regard to them are different from those that apply to other areas of NEA and in addition have been defined in considerable detail in NSC papers already approved.

(5) As to the remainder of the NEA area, it is difficult to make generalizations that apply equally to all parts of such a large and diverse area. There are, however, certain facts of general application:

(a) There is a growing danger that important parts of the area may be lost to the free world and to the West not so much through overt action resulting in war, but through a more subtle operation which can eventually lose us the support of important parts of NEA through neutralism or through communist penetration by methods short of open war. China is an example that we are not anxious to see duplicated in the Middle East.

(b) There is also the danger of a real loss to the free world and especially to Western Europe which would result if key parts of this area from which Europe draws much of its raw materials went behind the Iron Curtain.

(c) There is the steadily declining prestige and position in the Moslem world not only of France and the UK, but also of the US. This decline has been taking place steadily over the past several years and is continuing to take place in varying degrees throughout the area.

(d) The decline in US prestige in various countries of the area is reflected in the UN. While the US has in the past enjoyed a considerable measure of support in the UN from the states of the NEA area (always with the exception of the Arab stand on any issue relating to Palestine), the sixth session of the General Assembly recently closed in Paris demonstrated an increasing unwillingness of the representatives of the states in the NEA area to support the views and recommendations of the US especially when questions involving the US and the USSR were at issue. These representatives, it became clear, were not anxious to align themselves with either party any more closely than they felt they were forced to do.

(e) Certain characteristics run like a thread through the whole area of NEA. In the social and economic fields, these are the disparities in wealth between a small rich minority on the one hand and the low living standards and poverty of the great majority of the people on the other hand. In the political field, there are two important developments that apply in varying degrees to the area as a whole—the rising tide of nationalism and the growth of neutralism reflecting to a dangerous degree in some NEA countries an attitude of "a plague on both your houses", both the free world and the communist world.

[2] For documentation on this topic, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. III, Part 1, pp. 460 ff.

(6) So far as North Africa and the Middle East are concerned, friction with the West centers around two still burning issues:

(a) Opposition and increasing distrust of the French and of the British.

> It is hard for many Americans, unless they have recently visited certain parts of this area, to realize how general and how deep-seated is the distrust and in some cases hatred for the British and French because of their past or present colonial policies and activities. This, for example, is especially true of the British in Iran and Egypt and of the French in Morocco and Tunisia. Unfortunately the US is increasingly being put in the same imperialist category. As a result, we must face the fact that today perhaps the greatest single obstacle to the advancement of US objectives in this area lies in the feeling that the US is a major source of power behind what are considered to be the continuing colonial policies or practices of the French and of the UK.

(b) Distrust, at times bordering on hatred and contempt, of the US and of the UN for their responsibilities for the still unsolved Palestine problem.

> Both Arabs and Israelis, for different reasons, reflect this lack of confidence. Both parties remain obsessed by three major issues still unresolved:
> —The approximately 850,000 Arab refugees from Israel who have not been integrated into the life of the neighboring Arab States in which they are now living.
> —The lack of peaceful settlements to replace the uneasy armistice agreements that still exist between Israel and her Arab neighbors.
> —The real fear that exists on both sides of "another round" in the Palestine war.

(7) Iran also remains an unsolved problem that can damage US relations not only with Iran and neighboring Middle East states but also with the UK as well. GTI is now working on and should have ready shortly a revision of the NSC paper on Iran, 107/2 dated 27 June, 1951 and of the Progress Report dated 5 August, 1951. [3]

(8) Our preoccupation with Europe and with such crisis areas as Korea, Japan, Iran and Egypt, has already provided the Communists with tremendous advantages in Asia.

We cannot afford to continue toward South Asia, especially India and Pakistan, the somewhat indifferent attitudes which have prevailed in the past. The loss of India to the Communist orbit would mean that for all practical purposes all of Asia would be lost, and this would constitute a serious threat to the security position of the US. Subversion of South Asian countries with a population of nearly one-half billion and known resources of scarce strategic materials such as manganese, monazite, beryl, mica and kyanite, of which we import substantial amounts, would affect our defense program most unfavorably. Communist successes in the recent national elections in India show clearly that time is running out. Skillful exploitation of bitterness resulting from hunger and poverty has enabled the communists to gain new power through constitutional means in addition to advances made by use of propaganda and terrorism.

[3] For documentation on this topic, see volume x.

As to Kashmir, on January 17, Dr. Graham, UN representative, reported to the Security Council that he had failed to reach agreement on de-militarization, a pre-requisite for holding an impartial plebiscite to determine the future affiliation of that state. Dr. Graham, on request of the Security Council, agreed to return to the subcontinent to make a final attempt and expects to report back to the Security Council by March 31, 1952. The US should give him all possible support in his attempt to settle this most difficult problem which otherwise may lead to disaster in the sub-continent. [4]

(9) Nor is this the end. The present crises in Iran, Egypt and Tunisia, as well as the prospects of further difficulties in Palestine, Morocco and Kashmir unfortunately reflect more, not less, trouble ahead.

In developing further our policies we should take into account the increasing aid that Turkey, now that she is a full member of NATO, can lend to a more truly multilateral approach. In our own US interest we cannot afford to give even tacit backing to varying degrees of 19th century imperialism frequently linked to reactionary elements still in power in many countries in the area. Nor, on the other hand, can we afford to give indiscriminate support to all forms of nationalism especially of the extreme type that combines a demand for complete and immediate freedom with xenophobic opposition to every form or vestige of "foreign" interest.

(10) In essence our problem in NEA boils down to an attempt to reconcile what are sometimes considered as two irreconcilable objectives:

(a) To continue US support of the UK and France vis-à-vis Russia without losing for the free world any important segments of NEA;

(b) Or, to put it another way, to keep the support and friendship of rising nationalism in the NEA area without undermining legitimate local positions of our two strongest allies in NATO, the UK and France.

(11) The conclusions and recommendations in Part II which follow suggest specific lines of action. These recommendations, it should be noted, do not pretend to offer a new or revolutionary line of policy from what has been pursued to date. They do suggest in certain instances a change of emphasis and to some degree a change of direction with the objective of reversing the decline in influence and prestige of the US and of the free world in the NEA area that has been indicated above.

[4] For documentation, see vol. xi, Part 2, pp. 1162 ff.

Part II—Conclusions and Recommendations

(12) The NEA area as a whole.

Despite our commitments elsewhere, since the US is bearing an increasing share of the burden of defense of the free world, the US must in its own interest take more initiative than it has to date in the determination of policies relative to the area.

(a) The decline and weakness of the UK and of France in various sections of NEA have left a growing vacuum which should, from a US point of view, be filled, as far as possible, by elements friendly rather than hostile to the free world.

(b) This enlarged US role should not prevent us from supporting legitimate UK or French interests in the area especially when these assist in maintaining stability and thus reduce the demand for US forces.

> The need for harmony with our Western allies must not blind us to the urgent need for reform in some of the colonial or foreign policies of our allies. While the loss of the colonial empires or of privileged positions of our allies in this area would represent to them a material loss as well as one in prestige, we should make clear that, in our opinion, there is little hope that repressive political, economic or social policies will allow them to retain these areas or these positions. In fact the evidence grows that the cost of attempting to hold special positions by force is too great, whether in Egypt, Tunisia or elsewhere. Force will not succeed and will divert already badly needed manpower from Western Europe and to that extent weaken the whole free world structure. Mr. Churchill has, for example, already made quite clear that the UK has diverted more forces to Egypt than she can afford to leave there indefinitely.

(c) The US should stress to Western Europe the important advantages of retaining the voluntary cooperation and friendship offered by NEA independent countries such as Libya, Egypt, and Iran, as well as of colonial or former colonial areas even if the latter are now completely separated from any past economic ties with the colonial powers.

> If the antagonisms such as are growing against France in Morocco and Tunisia and against the UK in Egypt and Iran are allowed to develop further, these areas will become less useful supporters of the free world, even if they are not eventually lost completely by subversion to communism.

(d) It should be recognized, in line with Defense Department's theory, that the US is already militarily over extended, and that, at least for the cold war period, the major element needed to make US policy in the NEA area more effective is not the commitment of large US military forces.

> At the same time as a demonstration of growing US interest in the area, the US should give active support to the prompt establishment of the Middle East Command (MEC) and be prepared to supply a body of staff officers for its headquarters. Despite MEC's slow start, NEA considers MEC a sound vehicle for strengthening the position of the free world in this area.
> Without attempting a definite timetable for action, membership invitations might be considered in groups in the following order:
> a. The four sponsoring members with Egypt's previous invitation left open for acceptance at any time, as it has been to date.
> b. The three Commonwealths previously approached, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa plus Pakistan and India in case either one wishes to join.
> c. The Arab States, including Libya.
> d. Israel and Iran.

(e) In support of our moral leadership, our major contribution in this area should lie in the technical and economic fields.

> Assurances should be given to the states in the area that the US hopes to continue, as long as may be necessary, its technical and economic assistance to help improve basic social conditions and to help solve the complicated and difficult Palestine refugee problem.

(f) States of the NEA area must be made to realize the fundamental advantages to all free world governments of a stronger machinery of collective security.

> Arab States, for example, must see, even though they are not members, the indirect advantages to their protection from Greek and Turkish membership in NATO. Even more direct advantages will be derived from a strong regional MEC in which they can participate. They must be reminded that effective cooperation for defense, not neutralism, is their best assurance against an outbreak of a third world war, or, if this occurs, of being overrun in the event of a third world war.

(g) In the field of growing nationalism, the US must take fuller advantage of the almost automatic assumption of many people of the area that the US is sympathetic to people everywhere who are striving to obtain self-government.

> On the positive side we must make a more concerted and conscious effort to convince the peoples of the area and their governments that their long-term interests lie more with the > free world and the West than with communism and the USSR. On the negative side we must remind them, by the experiences of Poland and Czechoslovakia, of Bulgaria and Romania, that the principles of freedom and self-determination which they seek are not likely to be obtained under a communist regime.

(h) US economic and social programs should aim at assisting to the greatest extent possible present governments in doing what the colonial powers are charged with having failed adequately to do during their periods of occupation—to improve economic and social conditions of the average individual and to increase political stability.

> US policy must not only develop effective cooperative programs in the economic and social fields but must also see to it that their beneficial effects are felt by the masses of the people and not simply by a small ruling group.
> Plans for TCA rural activities already planned should be continued. However, because the rising political forces in the area have their leadership and main support in the cities, provision should also be made in our programs for projects which will tend to associate the interests of these urban forces with our own and to develop their interests in political stability in their countries.

(13) Specific Problems

As regards particular areas of NEA, the following specific recommendations are made:

(a) Arab States and Israel

> 1. The United States should take a more active interest in Near Eastern matters, particularly in areas where the activities of our NATO allies, Britain and France, are arousing the antagonism of the native populations. In particular, we should make clear the limits of our support of British and French policy in the area, and should press these two governments to modify their present anti-nationalist stands in the interest of easing negotiations for the solution of outstanding controversies.
> 2. We should increase our efforts to reverse the trend toward neutralism on the part of the Arab States as between the Western states and the Soviet bloc.
> 3. We should take impartial steps to strengthen the Arab States and Israel to improve individually and collectively their political and economic stability and to increase their will and ability to resist penetration by the USSR. This should be done through:

a. Prompt and effective implementation of technical, economic and military assistance programs.
b. Strengthened USIE programs.
c. Prompt establishment of the Middle East Command with US participation in staffing and training missions, and

d. Intensified bilateral diplomatic activity aimed particularly at efforts to solve the Arab-Israeli problem.

(b) North Africa

The primary objectives of US policy towards Libya, Morocco and Tunisia are the maintenance of political stability and the security of US forces in these countries.

The attainment of these objectives in the two French protectorates is made more difficult by efforts of the French to suppress the growing nationalist movements in these areas. It has been emphasized to the French that we are not advocating immediate independence for these countries. We believe, however, that a rapprochement between the French and the North Africans can be achieved only by adopting and implementing sound and forward looking programs of political reforms which will meet the legitimate demands of the Moroccans and Tunisians for increasing participation in the administration of their countries; that such programs be geared to an announced and carefully planned progressive timetable setting forth the progressive stages of evolution towards self-government; and that France is the nation to guide Morocco and Tunisia towards self-government. We should state that if programs of reforms for Morocco and Tunisia are adopted and continue to be implemented by the French we shall give appropriate support to these programs and use our influence with the Moroccans and Tunisians to insure their cooperation in the implementation of such programs. Our support of France's policy towards North Africa in the various organs of the UN should be contingent on France's performance in carrying out their announced programs in North Africa.

(c) Africa South of the Sahara

Our objective in Africa south of the Sahara is to urge the responsible European powers to press the political, economic and social advancement of the people of Africa at the maximum practicable rate.

Insofar as possible, colonial powers should be urged not to allow considerations of prestige or economic privileges to place an unnecessary brake on the increasing momentum which will inevitably be gained in the process of advance. To the extent that progress is made toward this objective, we should support the efforts of the European powers to carry out their commitments under Chapters XI and XII of the UN Charter.

(d) Iran

The US should maintain its efforts to induce the British and Iranians to modify their positions regarding settlement of the oil problem and should continue its efforts to arrive at a concert of views with the UK with respect to proposals which, while protecting basic Western interests, might make possible an early negotiated settlement.

If a settlement proves unobtainable, we should try to concert our views with the UK as to the course of action needed to prevent the continued deterioration of the situation and to reverse present trends. An agreed view may be impossible, however, because of the different estimates of the Iranian situation. In that event the US may be compelled to act independently on any forms of assistance if in the light of all relevant considerations such a course is decided to be in the best interests of the free world.

(e) South Asia

As to South Asia, while continuing consultations with the British on ways and means by which US-UK policies and actions can be better coordinated, we should:

(1) Provide such amounts of economic aid to South Asia, especially India and Pakistan, as will assist economic progress in the area and bring about rising standards of living to help insure essential political stability.
(2) Continue to increase the effectiveness of the USIE operations, maintained at approximately the present level of expenditure.
(3) Make available under Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, insofar as practicable, military supplies, equipment and services requested by India and Pakistan on a reimbursable basis.
(4) Increase the degree and scope of consultation with South Asian governments, especially on Asian problems and encourage them to consult more frankly with us.

(14) Mechanics of Procedure

As to the mechanics of procedure to assist in attaining the desired closer coordination with the UK and with France, two specific steps are suggested:

(a) First the attainment within the Department, and then with other interested government departments such as Defense, of a greater degree of agreement on US policy toward NEA countries. This might consist in an acceptance of the Conclusions and Recommendations of this memorandum which might be used as the basis for initial discussions with EUR, to which they have already agreed, looking toward a larger measure of departmental agreement.

(b) After (a) has been achieved, a plan to hold three-power discussions at the Assistant Secretary level with UK and French Foreign Office officials as needed but not less often than once a year. On SOA issues the French would be omitted from these discussions.

In certain of these meetings the inclusion of interested British commonwealth representatives might also be considered.

These discussions are conceived of as dealing primarily with policy matters and therefore are in addition to the diplomatic exchanges on the operating level which already occur daily both in Washington and abroad.

Editorial Note

Henry Byroade assumed the duties of Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs on April 14, 1952. At the end of April he took a trip to the Middle East to visit the United States Missions in the area, to acquaint himself with local and regional situations, and to discuss problems with the Chiefs of Mission. His visits to each post were short, and he emphasized the preliminary and introductory character of his trip at each stop. A copy of the original itinerary listed April 29 as Byroade's departure date from New York and had him scheduled to return to Washington on June 7 after spending 2 days, June 4 and 5, in London. A memorandum of conversation in Department of State files, however, contains an account of a meeting in the British Foreign Office on June 9 in which Byroade met with a number of officers of the Foreign Office in a general discussion of the impressions he had formed on his trip. (Memorandum of conversation, June 9, 1952; 611.41/6–952) Additional documentation on Byroade's trip is in Department of State file 110.15 BY.

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs (Foster) [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 16, 1952.

Subject: Report of the State–Defense Working Group on the Middle East Command.

The Problem

EUR clearance for the Report.

Background

You will recall that a State–Defense Working Group has been engaged since February 19 on the preparation of a paper setting forth the recommended position to be taken by the U.S. representatives at the forthcoming seven-power meeting (U.S., U.K., France, Turkey, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa) to be held during the next month or two, probably in London, in connection with the proposed establishment of the Middle East Command. The Working Group, chairmanned by Mr. Lewis Jones of NEA, has included Messrs. Nolting of G, Stabler, Dorsz, and Daspit of NEA, Spalding of RA, Vigderman of L/E, Foster of DNA, and Captains Loud and Patrick (USN) of the Gold Team of Defense.

[1] This memorandum was addressed to Perkins and Bonbright.

The Working Group completed its labors on April 9 and has embodied its recommendations in the attached report, [2] which is now being sent up the line in State and Defense. In State it is to be cleared through NEA, EUR, G, S/P (Mr. Nitze), S/A (Mr. Jessup), C, L, H, and the Under Secretary to the Secretary. In Defense it is to be sent up from the Gold Team through the Joint Chiefs to the Secretary.

It should be noted in connection with Defense clearance that the representatives of the Gold Team have made it clear that they have not been in a position to speak for the Joint Chiefs or the Defense Department and cannot promise clearance by either. On our side, I have informed the Group that I could not say whether you would approve the report. Mr. Nolting is apparently satisfied with the report and I gather he feels that Mr. Matthews approves the general line it follows. I understand that Mr. Ferguson of S/P and Mr. Jessup of S/A read an earlier draft and were generally satisfied with it. Mr. Byroade has read the present draft but I do not know whether he has approved it.

There has been no consultation with any of the other six governments to be represented at the conference—no consultation, that is to say, with regard to the agenda or the major problems which will be discussed. It is true that the other powers are known to support the MEC in principle, and as far as the British are concerned you may recall that they gave us in January and February some memoranda generally outlining the U.K. position. Mr. Jones has felt that it was desirable to establish the U.S. position before engaging in preliminary discussions with the other governments.

The Working Group's Recommendations

You will note that the Working Group's report recommends that the U.S. should be represented at the conference by State and Defense officers of the level of Deputy Assistant Secretary of State. The Working Group is of the opinion that the U.S. representatives should be given as much leeway as possible, particularly since we do not know what the attitudes of the other six governments are going to be in regard to many of the subjects for discussion. The U.S. representatives would, in any case, be empowered to agree only ad referendum.

[2] Not printed; a copy of the complete Working Group Report is in the PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Near and Middle East, 1952-3".

The Working Group's philosophy is epitomized in the statement (under "Facts and Assumptions", section II 2 (a)) that > "The United States supports the establishment of a Middle East Command Organization in the belief that such an organization may make an early contribution to the political stabilization of the vitally important Middle East area, and in the long run increase the capacity of the area to resist Soviet aggression."

In brief, the Working Group recommends that the MEC should be established as soon as possible, probably with headquarters on Cyprus; that the Supreme Allied Commander Middle East, probably a Britisher, should be appointed; that there should be some kind of authority for the direction of SACME (perhaps a Military Committee or a Standing Group), though it is recognized that conditions in the Middle East preclude the possibility of establishing a higher political direction on the NATO model; that SACME should devote himself to "planning, coordinating and liaison"; and that liaison between SACME and the interested Arab states should be maintained by a Middle East Defense Liaison Organization (MEDLO).

"United States participation in the Command will be limited to participation in the integrated Command staff and the provision of some military aid to certain states in the Middle East area. No commitment of United States forces to the defense of the Middle East is contemplated"(II 5 (a)).

The Working Group recognizes that in its initial stage the Middle East Command will not be a command and that SACME will not command anything. It discussed the possibility of changing the name to conform to the realities. "Middle East Defense Planning Board" or "Middle East Defense Organization" were suggested, but the feeling was that there would be difficulty in changing the name at this stage and "the name is valued by the British by reason of tradition and prestige" (V1).

Hamlet Without the Hamlet

There is one fundamental aspect of the problem which is touched on only in passing in the Working Group's paper but which has had a profound influence on its reasoning and recommendations. This is the fact that Turkey is now in NATO and the assumption, flowing from that fact, that the Middle East Command will have neither any responsibility for the defense of Turkey nor the support of any Turkish forces (except six divisions which it is said Turkey might consider contributing if the U.S. would pay for them).

A further assumption accepted by a majority of the Working Group is that the Turks feel such resentment and antipathy toward the British, chiefly because of British opposition to the Turks joining NATO, that they will not cooperate with a British Middle East Commander.

The Arab Reaction

There is another fundamental aspect of the problem which is not discussed in the Working Group's paper. This is the possibility, mentioned in reports from our embassies in the Middle East and in various intelligence appreciations, that the Arab peoples will not welcome the establishment of the MEC but may regard it as the vehicle of Western imperialism, Turkish power politics, British special interests, et cetera. The Working Group is reconciled to the strong improbability of Egyptian participation in MEC but it assumes that at least some of the other Arab states will come in on an "associate membership" basis.

Some Unanswered Questions

1. Two Birds with One Stone?

There would seem to be, from the point of view of the U.S. in particular and the West in general, two separate though related problems in the Middle East. The first in urgency and importance is surely the military defense of the area against possible Soviet attack through the Caucasus and across the Straits. Regardless whether the U.S. participates actively in the military defense of the region (and now that Turkey is in NATO we are bound, even more than we were under the Truman Doctrine, to render her such assistance as we can), it is my understanding that we agree with the British in considering it vital to the West that efforts should be made to hold the Middle East.

The second problem in the Middle East is the political one. It is compounded of rising Arab nationalism, the Anglo-Egyptian dispute, the Israeli-Arab conflict, Mosadeq, the preoccupation of Pakistan with Kashmir, the declining prestige of the U.K., France, and the U.S. in the area, and plenty of other things. This is the long-term problem which it will obviously take generations to solve.

Can any single stone be found that will kill these two birds?

2. Does the Proposed MEC Face Up to the Military Problem?

If it is the military objective to defend the Middle East against Soviet attack, the first point for determination is what effective forces are available? The answer is, of course, the Turkish army, certain British ground forces and air squadrons, and certain Commonwealth forces committed to the area in case of war. From the military standpoint it would seem to be the essence of the problem to devise the means to coordinate Turkish and British resources and plans. The proposed MEC, however, is founded on the assumption, as noted above, that such coordination in any real sense is politically impossible.

3. Will the Proposed MEC Strengthen the British Position in the Middle East?

Inasmuch

as SACME will not command anything (except perhaps some British forces at a later stage), as SACME's defense preparations will have to be made in relative isolation from the Turks, as SACME's terms of reference will put him squarely in the center of the major political problems of the area, and as the U.S. will neither contribute forces to his command nor undertake any commitment to defend the area, the question may be asked whether the proposed MEC is in line with the declared U.S. policy of supporting the British position in the Middle East.

The Working Group took the view that the British are reconciled to this dismal situation and will be glad enough to have the MEC established and the position of SACME given to a Britisher even though he will have little or no support from anyone except the Commonwealth. It might be argued that Mr. Churchill's statement to Congress in January that he would welcome the presence of U.S. token forces in the Canal Zone was not only out of step with modern times but tactless besides. Be this as it may, the question remains whether it is in the U.S. interest to accept a situation to which the British, lacking our support, have no recourse but to reconcile themselves.

4. Can Such a Military Organization Accomplish the Desired Political Objectives in the Middle East?

This is the reverse of the military-political coin. If it may be doubted that a "political" MEC will be able to take effective steps toward the military defense of the area against possible Soviet aggression, it may also be doubted whether an organization bearing the name "Command" and sponsored by six states not indigenous to the area (plus one Middle Eastern state that has joined NATO) will succeed in gaining the confidence and support of the Arab peoples.

5. Should the MEC Concept be Re-appraised?

During the six months since the MEC was rejected by the Egyptians (October 1951) and since the Paris Declaration (November 1951) there have been certain developments which perhaps call for a re-appraisal from both the military and political viewpoints. These developments include the accession of Turkey to NATO, the Anglo-Egyptian dispute, growing Arab unrest in French North Africa, and the Iranian situation.

6. Would a Seven-power Conference in the Near Future Serve a Useful Purpose?

Until the political and military objectives of the U.S. in the Middle East are more clearly defined and widely agreed, and until we have a better idea of what the other interested governments, especially the British, expect of the MEC, the question is whether a seven-power conference could achieve the results evidently expected of it. True, the conference is intended to be "preliminary" and is to try to avoid publicity. If, however, it fails to reach agreement (even on an ad referendum basis) or if it arouses fundamental differences, the news is bound to leak and the MEC enterprise will benefit least of all among the Arabs at which it is aimed.

Conclusion

Mr. Lewis Jones argues, with the support of the majority of the members of the Working Group, that the recommendations in the attached paper are in conformity with U.S. policy toward the Middle East as determined by the highest levels in the Government; further, that the situation in the area dictates this as the best approach to the problem. I have felt bound, however, to put the foregoing questions before you. They really boil down to one question: What is the U.S. stake in the Middle East and is the kind of MEC proposed by the Working Group the best way to defend it?

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Politico-Military Adviser, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Daspit)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 24, 1952.[1]

Subject: Discussion of MECO Position Paper—April 24, 1952.

Participants:

Mr. Bruce	Mr. Jessup	Mr. Bonbright
Mr. Matthews	Mr. Nitze	Mr. Byroade
Mr. Nolting	Mr. Ferguson	Mr. Lewis Jones
Mr. Bohlen	Mr. Wadsworth	Mr. Daspit

---

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on May 9.

The meeting was called by Mr. Matthews to discuss the draft position paper on the MECO prepared by the State–Defense Working Group. [2] The principal points made in the course of the discussion are summarized under topical headings.

(1) Benefits to be Expected from MECO.

Underlying the discussion was the assumption that at least during its initial phase, the MECO would not make a substantial direct contribution to the military strengthening of the Middle East area. To justify US participation, there must be a reasonable prospect that the organization will produce desirable political results.

(2) Military Aspect of MECO.

Mr. Nitze stated, and there was no disagreement, that so far as its military operations were concerned, the MECO would be in its initial phases merely a paper organization. It would have small forces and there would be little place to put them. Given current scarcities of military equipment and the relative position of the Middle East area in the system of worldwide priorities, the ME could expect very small amounts of equipment. Moreover, it was doubtful that MECO would have much control over such supplies as were made available. Mr. Nitze also doubted that there was sufficient substance involved in the MEDLO operation to make this organization meaningful and attractive to the Arab States. In reply, Mr. Byroade conceded that the Command would not have much of immediate substance with which to concern itself. Nevertheless, it would not vary greatly from other operations with which the British were familiar. The South East Asia Command during the war, for example, had been little more than a planning operation but it had a certain utility.

(3) Effect of MECO on Western Position in the Middle East.

Mr. Byroade thought that the organization, at the least, would provide a means for demonstrating the unity of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey and their interest in the defense of the area. It would provide a useful forum in which the four powers could speak jointly to the states of the Middle East.

The question was raised as to whether participation by the US in the MECO would have the effect of raising Western prestige generally in the Middle East or of pulling down the US to the level of the UK and France. Mr. Nitze stated that what we were proposing to do was to use our prestige but not our strength to keep up the British position. The British, however, have little physical and less moral strength in the area; consequently in embarking on this course we ran the danger of becoming involved in their general decline in the Middle East without being able effectively to halt it.

Mr. Byroade said that he assumed that our policy was one of continued cooperation with the UK and secondarily with France in the Near East, and that he felt the MECO was the most promising way of making that cooperation effective. If it was proposed that we abandon this policy and play a lone hand, then of course the proposals would have to be considered in a different light.

Ambassador Wadsworth felt that unless the US became strongly identified with the MECO, the prospects of the organization would not be good. He felt that its best hope of success would derive from its having the strongest possible US flavor. Specifically, he felt that the proposed preliminary planning meeting should be held in Washington and that the MECO Steering Group should be located in Washington.

(4) Possibility of Securing Arab Cooperation.

Mr. Nitze asserted that the MECO as proposed would be merely a planning operation and planning with weakness at that. He felt the Arabs would sense this fact and would be frightened off. To go ahead without the Arabs might be a dangerous and destructive course, as it might be construed by the Arabs as a combination of the West against the Middle East. If the Anglo-Egyptian dispute could be settled and Egypt were willing to cooperate, he felt these dangers would disappear and that it would be proper to go ahead with the establishment of the MECO.

Ambassador Wadsworth felt that even without initial Arab support or positive commitment of forces from Turkey, it would nevertheless be desirable to go ahead with the establishment of the MECO. He felt it was essential to plan on an area basis, and that MECO was needed for this purpose. He felt that the position of the Middle East was vital to NATO planning since it involved the Southern flank of the European command. He suggested that it might be desirable to have the views from the JCS and the Standing Group.

(5) Effect of Establishment of MECO on Iran.

Mr. Nitze advanced as another objection to proceeding with the establishment of the MECO, the effect this action might have in prejudicing an alternative development which he considered preferable. This alternative was the extension of the Truman Doctrine to Iran and the development in that country of a really effective barrier to Soviet expansion. If this could be accomplished, it would provide a solid defensive shield extending from Yugoslavia through Pakistan. This would provide the Middle East area with more real security than the paper planning of MECO. He thought that the achievement of this objective would be made more difficult, if not impossible, by the decision of the US to place its major military emphasis on the MECO, which would be primarily a British show under the Command of a British General.

This thesis was not generally accepted. It was pointed out that the developments which Mr. Nitze wished to see in Iran were even more remote and beset by doubts than the development of real military strength through MECO. Mr. Ferguson stated that he did not consider that the two courses were mutually exclusive and there seemed to be fairly general agreement with this view.

(6) The Extent of US Commitment to Participation.

Mr. Jessup cited a statement in the November Declaration that the four powers intended to proceed with the establishment of the Middle East Command and the communiqué issued on January 9 after the Truman-Churchill talks reaffirmed the intent of the US and the UK to press ahead with the establishment of a Command. He felt that if it should be decided to scrap the Middle East Command, it was essential that something else be found to put in its place.

(7) Timing of Seven-Power Meeting.

It seemed to be generally agreed that it would be impossible to hold a planning meeting of the nature contemplated in the report on a secret basis. News of the meeting was certain to leak out and regardless of whether the meeting was designated "preliminary" the effect of US participation would amount to a final and irrevocable commitment on our part to push the MECO through. Mr. Matthews considered that the present state of affairs with the Middle East and with development in Tunisia, Egypt and Iran was not propitious for holding a meeting.

(8) Next Steps.

Except for the position indicated in (7) no decisions were taken with respect to the Working Group paper. It was agreed that no intimation should be given to the Defense Department that the Department was not proceeding urgently with the consideration of the draft. Mr. Matthews agreed to raise with the British Ambassador the question of present British thinking on the MECO and the possibility was left open of strictly secret bilateral discussions between the British and ourselves.

Statement of Policy Proposed by the National Security Council [1]

[WASHINGTON, April 24, 1952.]

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO THE ARAB STATES* AND ISRAEL

OBJECTIVES

1. The objectives of the United States with respect to the area comprising the Arab States and Israel are:

a. To overcome or prevent instability within these countries which threatens Western interests.
b. To prevent the extension of Soviet influence and at the same time to strengthen Western influence.
c. To insure that the resources of the area are available to the United States and its allies for use in strengthening the free world.
d. To strengthen the will and ability of these countries to resist possible future aggression by the Soviet Union.
e. To establish within the community of nations a new relationship with the states of the area that recognizes their desire to achieve status and respect for their sovereign equality.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

2. The area comprising the Arab States and Israel is of great political and strategic importance because of its geographic position, its natural defensive barriers, its sites for military bases, its position with respect to transportation routes, its petroleum resources and installations, the fact that it is a center for powerful world-

[1] NSC 129/1 also includes a memorandum for the NSC by the Executive Secretary; notes to the NSC by the Executive Secretary; a Statement by the United States, United Kingdom, France, and Turkey on the Middle East Command, dated Nov. 10, 1951; and an NSC Staff Study on "United States Objectives and Policies With Respect to the Arab States and Israel"; none printed.

The Statement of Policy printed here was adopted by the National Security Council, together with the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in NSC Action No. 629, at the 115th meeting of the NSC on Apr. 23, 1952, with the President presiding. The President approved it on Apr. 24, 1952, and ordered its implementation by all appropriate executive departments and agencies of the U.S. Government under the coordination of the Secretary of State. (S/S-NSC files, lot 63 D 351, "NSC 129 Memoranda"; S/S-NSC (Miscellaneous) files, lot 66 D 95, "Policies of the Government of the United States of America Relating to the National Security, vol. V, 1952") wide religious groups, and the effects of its alignment on the prestige of the Western powers and on the policies of other countries in the Middle East, Africa and Asia.

* For the purposes of this paper, the Arab States include Egypt, Yemen, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Syria and Iraq. United States Policy toward Iran will be covered in a separate report constituting a revision of NSC 107/2. [Footnote in the source text. NSC 107/2 and its revision are scheduled for publication in volume x.]

3. These political and strategic factors are so important to the overall position of the free world that it is in the security interest of the United States to take whatever appropriate measures it can, in the light of its other commitments, to achieve the objectives stated above.

4. Currently, the danger in this area to the security of the free world arises not so much from the threat of direct Soviet military attack as from acute instability, anti-western nationalism and Arab-Israeli antagonism which could lead to disorder and eventually to a situation in which regimes oriented toward the Soviet Union could come to power.

5. Current acute situations requiring United States initiative are:

(a) the controversy between the U.K. and Egypt, and (b) continued Arab-Israeli tensions.

POLICIES AND COURSES OF ACTION

The Area as a Whole

6. The United States should take an increased share of responsibility toward the area, in concert with the U.K. to the greatest practicable extent, and where appropriate also in concert with France and Turkey, on the basis that:

a. The United States should be prepared to play a larger role in safeguarding Western interests in the area, particularly by attempting to facilitate political settlements among the nations of the area and between them and the Western nations, and by providing appropriate economic, technical and military assistance.

b. The United States should, however, endeavor to persuade other nations, particularly the U.K. to provide such armed forces as may be necessary and appropriate to defend Western interests in the area.

c. The special United States-Saudi Arabia arrangements now existing should continue.

7. With respect to the Middle East Command (MEC),† the United States should:

a. Continue its efforts to establish the Command as a means of increasing the stability and strengthening the defense of the area.

† See Appendix A. [Footnote in the source text. Appendix A was the statement by the United States, United Kingdom, France, and Turkey, Nov. 10, 1951, stating the principles guiding the four governments in their intention to establish the Middle East Command. For documentation on this topic, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, pp. 243 ff.]

b. Make every appropriate effort to obtain at least token force contributions to the Command from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and when practicable from Pakistan.

c. Seek to obtain the participation of the states in the area in a Middle East defense arrangement.

d. While maintaining flexibility as to the commitment of U.S. forces for the local defense of the area in the event of general war, be prepared to reenforce political and psychological measures in the area by assigning U.S. token forces in a Middle East defense arrangement if U.S. willingness to take this action is seen to be the key to the establishment of such an arrangement and to the settlement of the dispute between the U.K. and Egypt.

e. Be prepared to participate in the integrated staff of the MEC.

8. The United States should seek to create an atmosphere which will facilitate obtaining base rights where required within the area, and upon the threat of and during general hostilities, the right to operate forces in the territories of the various nations of the area.

9. As a means of diminishing the threat posed by nationalistic demands for the elimination of Western interests and by political instability in the area, the United States should make the fullest practicable use of psychological and political programs (including special political measures) and of economic and military aid programs and technical cooperation to influence the process of political change into channels that will effect the least compromise of Western interests and will offer the maximum promise of stable non-communist regimes. The United States should direct these programs and measures along the following lines:

a. To support or develop those leadership groups in the area which offer the greatest prospect of establishing political stability oriented toward the free world.

b. Place increased emphasis on measures designed to have an early and stabilizing effect upon urban groups.

c. To improve or, where advisable, assist in the construction of such facilities, especially in the field of transportation and communications, as are capable of direct contribution to regional defense requirements.

d. Continue technical cooperation programs designed to improve the living standards and level of health and education of the rural population, including actions leading to solutions of problems of land tenancy and credit.

The U.K.-Egyptian Dispute

10. With respect to the U.K.-Egyptian dispute, the United States should:

a. Continue to concert with the U.K. in developing proposals which might make possible an early negotiated settlement.

b. Continue its efforts to induce the Egyptians to reach a settlement which will protect basic Western interests.

c. If necessary to secure a settlement, let it be known that the United States is prepared to take the action set forth in paragraph 7 d above.

Arab-Israeli Disputes

11. The United States should utilize all feasible and appropriate means to resolve the issues which prevent the abatement of Arab distrust of Israel and resulting animosity toward the United States. To this end the United States should promote and encourage, without partiality as between Israel and the several Arab states but consistent with strategic considerations:

a. Progress toward a solution of the refugee problem in the area.

b. Settlement of local Arab-Israeli disputes, such as boundary problems, questions of water rights, and establishment of financial and economic arrangements between Israel and the Arab States which would permit the resumption of commercial intercourse within and through the area, uninterrupted flow of petroleum products, and uninhibited operation of and access to internal and international surface and air transport facilities.

c. Modification of Israeli immigration policy in order to reduce possible pressures within Israel for expansion to accommodate the influx of population.

12. The United States should continue the policy set forth in the Tripartite Declaration of May 25, 1950, as follows:

The Governments of the United Kingdom, France, and the United States, having had occasion during the recent Foreign Ministers' Meeting in London to review certain questions affecting the peace and stability of the Arab states and of Israel, and particularly that of the supply of arms and war material to these states, have resolved to make the following statements:

> 1. The three Governments recognize that the Arab states and Israel all need to maintain a certain level of armed forces for the purposes of assuring their internal security and their legitimate self-defense and to permit them to play their part in the defense of the area as a whole. All applications for arms or war material for these countries will be considered in the light of these principles. In this connection the three Governments wish to recall and reaffirm the terms of the statements made by their representatives on the Security Council on August 4, 1949, in which they declared their opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab states and Israel.
> 2. The three Governments declare that assurances have been received from all the states in question, to which they permit arms to be supplied from their countries, that the purchasing state does not intend to undertake any act of aggression against any other state. Similar assurances will be requested from any other state in the area to which they permit arms to be supplied in the future.

3. The three Governments take this opportunity of declaring their deep interest in and their desire to promote the establishment and maintenance of peace and stability in the area and their unalterable opposition to the use of force or threat of force between any of the states in that area. The three Governments, should they find that any of these states was preparing to violate frontiers or armistice lines, would, consistently with their obligations as members of the United Nations, immediately take action, both within and outside the United Nations, to prevent such violation.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 29, 1952.

Subject: UK Memorandum on MEC

Participants:

Department of State	British Embassy
NE—Mr. Jones	Mr. Burrows
NE—Mr. Kopper	Mr. Greenhill
NE—Mr. Stabler	Mr. Marten
NEA—Mr. Daspit

Officers of the British Embassy called to hand the Department a memorandum on the MEC [1] further to their memorandum of January 31 [2] on the same subject. The discussion on the memorandum which took place was intended to be preliminary only, and Mr. Jones indicated that the Department would make further comment.

As to the UK position that plans for a conference in London on the Middle East Command Organization should be further postponed in view of the unresolved state of UK-Egyptian negotiations, the British were told that the Department shared their opinion.

[1] Telegram 4909 from London, Apr. 29, not printed, informed the Department of State that the British Foreign Office had also delivered a copy of the memorandum to the Embassy. The Ambassador advised the Department he had indicated to the British that their plan to single out Iraq to join a regional defense organization could present a number of difficulties with such states as Syria and Saudi Arabia. (780.5/4-2952)

[2] Regarding this memorandum, see the memorandum of conversation, Document 58.

There was some discussion of the UK suggestion that when the conference is held, it would be advantageous to invite Iraq and Egypt but none of the other Arab states. Mr. Burrows indicated that the UK was concerned about the problem of Arab participation in the MECO and felt that the chances of securing their cooperation would be better if they were brought into the discussion during the preliminary phase. On the other hand, it seemed clearly impossible to launch the organization at a meeting attended by representatives of the six Arab States as well as the seven sponsoring powers. The solution which recommended itself to them was to invite only these two states to the organizing meeting on the theory that if they joined the MECO the other Arab States would follow. This proposal was contingent on a successful settlement with Egypt, which would be invited because of its political and strategic importance. Iraq would be invited because of its friendly interest in the MEC, its strategic importance and its economic and military potential.[3]

Mr. Jones stated that the Department has also been concerned about the question of securing Arab support and felt that this probably required that the Arabs should be approached before the form of organization was definitely fixed. He agreed with the British view that it was impossible to expect a meeting of 13 powers, including all the Arab States, to develop a detailed organization plan from the general principles of last November. He found it difficult to accept, however, the conclusion that the British had drawn from this premise—that is, that two of the six Arab States should be invited to attend a meeting on the organization of the MEC while the remaining four were passed over. Such an action would hardly further the MEC objective of promoting area-wide cooperation on a basis of equality. If Egypt were to offer real concessions to MECO, bases for example, there would be plausible grounds for discriminating in her favor. If it was proposed that British military rights in Iraq were to be converted into general MECO rights, there might also be grounds for discriminating in favor of Iraq. Otherwise, he thought the effects of such discrimination would be most unfortunate. Why should Syria, for example, not be invited? There were numerous indications that the Shishakli regime might be embarking on a policy of cooperation with the West. To discriminate against Syria in invitations to the MECO meeting might have the effect of reversing this favorable development. Moreover, Saudi Arabia, which had been cooperating with the West and had granted the U.S. important military rights, would probably be seriously offended.

[3] Telegram 805 from Baghdad, Mar. 28, not printed, reported that Dr. Fadhil Jamali, President of the Iraq Chamber of Deputies, had taken a definite stand against a four-power approach to Middle East defense. "He has stated to Embassy officer that presence of Turkish and French in ME defense not only unnecessary but, in view of their past imperialism in ME and the latter's current record in Tunisia and North Africa, their participation in ME defense unacceptable." According to the Embassy, while those views represented a trend in current Iraqi thinking toward the Middle East Command, "Jamali's views may also reflect Nuri's [Nuri as Said, Iraqi Prime Minister] reported desire to set up alternative approach to ME defense through Arab collective security pact or possibly Islamic grouping including Pakistan." (780.5/3-2852)

Telegram 955 from Baghdad, May 2, not printed, agreed it was desirable to take advantage of Iraq's interest in defense arrangements with the Western powers. It doubted the wisdom, however, of inviting Iraq to a preparatory meeting if Egypt showed a willingness to participate, since special consideration for Iraq "might further adversely affect Iraq's already poor relations with other Arab States." The Embassy also suggested that Iraq's desire to attend a preliminary meeting might come from "wish to shape MEC to its own pattern rather than from any clear desire to participate with west in defense of area." (780.5/5-252)

Mr. Burrows wondered if there was really much danger that the other Arab States would hold out if both Iraq and Egypt accepted membership in the MECO. Mr. Greenhill suggested that the two states might in fact consult with the other Arab States before accepting such an invitation. Mr. Jones thought that if they did consult it would be in a manner intended to emphasize their preferred position, and that this might poison the whole venture in the minds of Arab States.

There was a general informal discussion of possible ways of bringing the Arab States into the preliminary planning for MECO while avoiding the confusion and probable futility of a general thirteen power convention devoted to charter drafting. . . .

Mr. Burrows suggested that further progress in developing a common view of MECO might be made through ordinary diplomatic discussions. The general feeling, however, was that this procedure unless directed toward certain concrete proposals might produce endless complexities and an interminable round of conversations. It was suggested that a possible way to inject the necessary concrete element might be for the U.K. for example, to produce a memorandum setting forth in some detail its conception of the MECO. This memorandum could then be circulated for comments to the various sponsoring powers. After this stage two alternative procedures were possible: The Arab States could also be shown the memorandum informally, as if they were being consulted concurrently with all interested parties. After this, and depending on Arab reactions, a meeting might be called including all thirteen of the possible MECO members. . . .

Mr. Jones inquired whether the British had already prepared a memorandum on the MEC of the general nature discussed. Mr. Burrows said they had prepared such a paper some time ago, but that the problem would probably have to be restudied in view of the changes in the situation which have developed.

It was agreed that regardless of what specific procedures were followed, care must be taken to avoid injuring the susceptibilities of the French, Turks and Australians, and to maintain the utmost flexibility among the sponsoring powers in order to permit adaptation of the organization to the wishes of the Arab States.

Mr. Burrows raised the question of the treatment of Israel. Mr. Jones thought that this problem was soluble in the long run. Israel must be kept currently informed of developments and no secret should be made of this vis-à-vis the Arabs. The question of associating Israel with the Command would have to be handled separately in a separate meeting with Israel. He thought the Israelis would accept this procedure and that the Arabs would be unlikely to make strong objection.

Mr. Jones inquired whether the British expected a reply to their memorandum in writing. Mr. Burrows stated that they would be satisfied with an oral reply.

MIDDLE EAST COMMAND

Her Majesty's Government still feel that, since the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and Egypt are still unresolved, it would be premature to go ahead now with the plans for a conference in London on the Middle East Command Organization.

2. Her Majesty's Government wish, however, to continue their exchange of views with the United States Government on the Middle East Command, and particularly on the question whether it might be desirable to invite other Middle Eastern States to participate in a preliminary conference on the Middle East Command Organization. They had in mind particularly the interest shown by the Government of Iraq, who indicated that they would be willing to participate in a conference with the four sponsoring Powers and Egypt. Her Majesty's Government have accordingly considered how to proceed if the Egyptian Government agree to enter negotiations on a formula for defence acceptable both to the United Kingdom and to Egypt and if the defence negotiations thereafter make reasonable progress.

3. In that event to proceed with a conference in London of the four sponsoring Powers and Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa only, excluding Arab participation might lessen the prospect that the Egyptians and the Iraqis (who would feel rebuffed) would accept any proposals put forward by that conference and would increase the risk that Arab opinion would harden round the Arab Collective Security Pact as the only foundation acceptable to them for the defence of the Middle East. It seems, therefore, that the balance of advantage may lie in inviting Iraq and Egypt to be represented at the London Conference itself and that any previous exchange of views between the four sponsoring Powers and Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa which may prove necessary should be effected without a formal meeting between them. Both States would then be invited to become co-founders from the outset on the same footing as the other seven. This would admittedly present difficulties from a military point of view. The actual planning work would be complicated by the addition of these two Arab States to the Command, and by the appointment of Arab officers to suitable positions in the Command structure from the outset. But these drawbacks would have to be accepted.

4. The arguments for inviting Iraq in as a co-founder are:—

(a) That Iraq alone of the Arab States has shown a keen and friendly interest in our approach to the problem of Middle East defence;

(b) That after Egypt, Iraq is the most important Arab State in terms of size and economic potential;

(c) That Iraq forms with Turkey the Northern bastion for the defence of the Middle East with Egypt as the natural base;

(d) That Iraq is in a position to provide the Command with forces and facilities superior to those of any Arab State outside Egypt.

5. The argument against bringing in any other Arab States, other than Iraq and Egypt, at this stage is that, if we had any more, we should have to have them all. This would make the conference unmanageable, would confront us with an Arab league bloc within it, and would highlight the exclusion of Israel.

6. If it were agreed to invite Iraq, we would explain that we were doing our best to meet the views expressed by Iraq Ministers, but that at this stage it was for obvious reasons not possible to go ahead without France, Turkey and Australia, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa. (They had intimated that they would attend a conference of the four sponsoring Powers, Egypt and Iran, but that they would really prefer a four-power conference of U.K., U.S.A., Egypt and Iraq.)

7. If, on the other hand, our negotiations with Egypt break down, the prospect of securing other Arab participation in the defence of the Middle East will depend on the reactions of other Arab Governments to the circumstances of the break and on the situation obtaining in the Canal Zone thereafter. We therefore feel that we should leave for further examination the question whether, in the event of a breakdown of the Anglo-Egyptian negotiations, to invite Iraq to the London Conference or whether to proceed on the seven-Power basis originally suggested, or on some new basis altogether.

8. We should be glad to have the views of the United States Government on these questions.

(1) Dept agrees desirable postpone preliminary mtg on MECO until outcome Anglo-Egypt negots clearer. Dept also agrees that procedures for establishing MECO must be adapted to circumstances as affected by development these negots. Dept's present comments assume circumstances which will not diminish willingness Arab States to cooperate in venture.

(2) Dept agrees desirable consult Arab states while MECO still in planning stage. Problem

To consider what measures might be taken to bring about an improved prospect for defense security in the Middle East between now and 1955.

[1] Sent to Maj. Gen. C. P. Cabell, Director, the Joint Staff, Office of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, by Director of the Policy Planning Staff Nitze on May 26. It was to be used by H. Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under Secretary, as the basis for discussion with the Joint Chiefs of Staff at a meeting on May 28. The meeting was twice postponed, to June 4 and June 11, and was finally held on June 18; see Document 76.

Discussion

Even though the strength being created under NATO may be inadequate as against the requirements, strength is being built, and when coupled with our NATO commitments now extended to Greece and Turkey and the steps being taken to link Yugoslavia with Western defense, they offer a considerable deterrent to aggression in that theater.

In the Far East, our intervention in Korea has brought at least a temporary check to the progress of aggression in that area. The requirements for increasing Japanese strength, improving the capabilities on Formosa, and of stabilizing and then improving the situation in Southeast Asia can be roughly foreseen, although they may be extremely difficult of realization.

In the Middle East, however, the general picture appears to be one of such continuing weakness as to constitute an invitation to a shift in the theater of primary pressure if further Communist progress were to be successfully blocked in other areas.

The defense of the Middle East is primarily a U.K. responsibility. As we understand it, however, capabilities available to the British are wholly inadequate to defend the Middle East against Soviet aggression and it appears doubtful that they are adequate to provide the minimum requirements for even the shortest line of defense east of the Suez Canal.

The only indigenous forces in the area, aside from the Turks, which appear to have any useful capability at present are the Arab Legion and the Israeli, and these are apparently of very limited utility. Such strength as is at present assured to the U.K. from the Dominions is not only too little but would probably arrive too late.

Without suggesting any derogation of U.K. responsibility for the defense of the area, it would appear that the U.S. will have to provide more assistance and bring its influence to bear if we are to look forward to a significant strengthening of the situation in the Middle East.

Our influence and assistance might take several possible forms:

(a) In connection with our obligations to provide for the security of Australia and New Zealand, influence with these two Dominions so that they will create forces and make them available in time of peace, or sufficiently promptly after the outbreak of war to be effective;

(b) Influence with the Union of South Africa so that they will provide more substantial forces than they are at present willing to assign to the Middle East, and emphasis on the importance to their own security of successfully defending in the Middle East;

(c) Influence with the Turks, coupled with supply assistance as practicable to increase Turkey's capability of contributing to the defense of the area outside of Turkey;

(d) Influence with Pakistan, coupled with supply assistance as practicable to increase Pakistan's capability of contributing to the defense of the Middle East, and continued efforts to secure a settlement in Kashmir to this end;

(e) Influence with the Arab States, Israel and Iran, coupled with supply assistance as practicable, to:

1. Increase the effectiveness of Egyptian forces for the maintenance and defense of the Suez bases, in the event of an Anglo-Egyptian settlement;
2. Improve the effectiveness of the Israeli forces, and increase their size as Arab forces are increased;
3. Develop additional forces comparable to the Arab Legion where that is feasible, and in any case plan with the Arab States for effective guerrilla resistance;
4. Continue military assistance to Iran, and, in the event of improved political conditions there, seek the creation of forces capable of undertaking defense as well as security tasks.

(f) Assistance either to the U.K. or directly in meeting the air deficiency which now appears to exist.

We would appreciate having the views of the JCS as to (1) the relative importance and time phasing from their viewpoint of strengthening the Middle Eastern defense situation; (2) the relative importance from the military viewpoint of the objectives for which we might use our influence and assistance as outlined above; (3) the degree to which the use of atomic weapons against the mountain passes into the area would permit the defense of substantial portions of the Middle East even under present conditions.

SECRET [WASHINGTON, May 28, 1952.]

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to the paper entitled, "Recommended United States Position with Respect to the Establishment of a Middle East Command Organization" which was prepared by a

[1] This letter was attached to a memorandum from Berry to Matthews, dated May 23, not printed. The memorandum suggested that, since the statement of the Department of State to the British on May 20 had the effect of cancelling part of a paper formally under consideration by the Department of Defense, it would be desirable to give Defense officials notice of the action. It also stated that it would be desirable to give Defense notice of the approaching discussions with the British, and the expectation that Defense representatives would participate in them. (780.5/5-2852)

State–Defense Working Group and submitted jointly to the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense in a memorandum dated April 15, 1952.[2] Part III of this paper recommended a series of steps, beginning with a Seven-Power meeting in London, intended to effect the formal establishment of the MECO and the opening of Command headquarters. Part IV recommended a United States position with respect to the form and character of the proposed organization which was intended to serve as guidance to United States representatives in negotiations with the representatives of the other sponsoring powers looking to the establishment of the organization.[3] This paper is currently under consideration in the Department of State.

Recent developments have required this Department to take a position in advance of final action on the paper, with respect to the points covered in Part III. As the Defense Department is aware, on April 29 the British Embassy handed this Department a memorandum suggesting that the proposed Seven-Power meeting on MECO should be postponed until the Anglo-Egyptian situation becomes clearer, and suggesting the desirability of inviting Egypt and Iraq to such a meeting when held.[4] After consulting the Defense Department informally and seeking the views of our missions in the Near East and Turkey, the Department of State on May 20 made the attached statement on the United Kingdom memorandum to officers of the British Embassy.[5] The principal points of this memorandum may be summarized as follows:

1. It would be desirable to postpone the Seven-Power meeting pending a clarification of the Anglo-Egyptian situation.

[2] Not printed. A copy of the Apr. 15 memorandum was attached to the Berry memorandum of May 23. (780.5/5-2852) A summary of the report is in the memorandum of Apr. 16 by Foster, Document 69. A copy of the complete report is in the PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Near and Middle East, 1952-3". For a Department of State discussion of the paper, see the memorandum of conversation by Daspit, Document 70.

[3] Not printed. Part III, entitled "Recommended Schedule for Establishment of MECO," recommended an early date for the Seven-Power meeting. Part IV was entitled "Recommended US Position for Initial Seven-Power Meeting on MECO." It recommended, in part, that the higher direction for the Middle East Command should come from an infrequently meeting Middle East Military Committee, on which all sponsoring and participating states would be represented at the Chiefs of Staff level; but specific policy guidance would be furnished by a subcommittee of that body, which would function continuously as an executive agent. It also recommended that, on some matters, the views of the British should be given special consideration "in view of their general responsibilities in the Middle East and the primacy of their role in MECO as evidenced by the US intention to support the designation of a British national as SACME." (PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Near and Middle East, 1952-3")

2. The Arab States should be consulted while MECO is in the planning stage.

3. It would be unwise to invite Egypt and Iraq alone of all the Arab States to attend a meeting charged with the task of drafting a form of organization for MECO.

4. Before consulting the Arab States, it is essential to coordinate the views of the Seven-Powers with respect to the general form and character of the organization and the essential elements which could not be compromised even for Arab cooperation.

5. It might be desirable to effect this coordination through diplomatic channels rather than by means of a meeting. After this step had been completed, the Arab States should be consulted at approximately the same time and on the same basis. It could then be determined how best to proceed with the establishment of the definitive form of the organization.

6. Israel should be informed of developments at the same time the Arab States are approached.

7. The Department of State is prepared at an early date to discuss with the British Embassy, in great confidence, current British thinking concerning the form and character of the MECO, as a preliminary to possible wider discussions among all the sponsoring powers.

The Department of State is concerned about the problem of securing Arab cooperation with MECO, and considers that the procedures outlined above are better adapted to this objective than those recommended by the Working Group. It is hoped that they will make it possible to develop a Seven-Power position on MECO without causing disquiet in the Arab States, and at the same time will leave us considerable latitude in determining the manner and timing of approaches to the Arab States. This Department feels that this latter problem should receive further careful study, which can proceed concurrently with the proposed diplomatic discussions concerning the form and character of the organization. There are various political factors which may affect the timing and manner of further moves directed toward the establishment of MECO, and this Department will continue to keep the situation under review.

The Department accordingly suggests that the review of the Working Group paper be limited to the recommended position set forth in Part IV, since a joint State-Defense position on the points covered in this part will be sufficient for purposes of the proposed discussions with the British. The Department hopes that it will be possible to establish such a joint position by the time the British are ready to present their views and that the Department of Defense will be prepared to designate a representative to participate in the discussions.

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State:

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Matthews: We would like to discuss with you this morning our strategy toward the Middle East and what we can do in light of the vacuum in that area.

General Bradley: This is a very important area and it is highly desirable to do something about its defense. The question seems to be: Where will the stuff come from? It will take a lot of stuff to do a job there. The problem of getting Australia and New Zealand to do much in the area will be difficult until we are prepared to do something. Now that the Turks have gotten into NATO they say they are prepared to support the Middle Eastern Command and they may be willing to do something. I don't know how far we could get with Pakistan until the Kashmir problem has been solved. If we give Pakistan military aid we will find ourselves in trouble with India. When we look at Israel and the Arab States it seems clear that if we give something to Israel we will have to give something to the Arab States. Again, where is the stuff coming from? Our present priorities put Korea in first position, then Indochina, and then the U.S. and NATO. We don't think those priorities can be changed.

[2] The meeting was held at 11 a.m. at the Pentagon.

Mr. Nitze: We had looked at the problem from a somewhat different point of view. If we think that by 1956 we could really build up a defensive position in the Middle East, then it would be possible to think about a forward strategy as we have in Western Europe. In other words, if we look at this as a 1956 problem rather than a current problem, then perhaps matters will not look as hopeless. Certainly there is plenty of manpower there from which to build divisions. Looking at the problem of equipment and finances that far ahead, the problem does not look unmanageable to us.

General Bradley: We admit the great importance of the area. We think quite a lot could be done politically. This would have to be coupled with some military aid. We think, however, that outside forces would be required and where are these troops to come from? We might come to view it as a problem about which something could be done by 1956, but we are reluctant to commit U.S. forces to the area, much as we want to defend Middle Eastern oil and the area as a whole. This is not a problem of objectives but a problem of how to get the job done.

Mr. Nitze: In our view we should not commit U.S. troops, even in 1956.

General Bradley: Nevertheless, it would be hard to persuade anyone else that the Middle East could be defended without U.S. troops.

Mr. Matthews: How do you envisage the defense of the Middle East? Is it a realistic matter?

General Bradley: Our feeling is that it is not now too realistic.

General Collins: What are the British doing to obtain commitments from Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. Matthews: I don't know. Perhaps Mr. Perkins knows something about it.

Mr. Perkins: I don't know what they are doing.

General Collins: We have committed ourselves to the defense of Australia and New Zealand. We have guaranteed them against an invasion. We have done all this precisely to free up Australian and New Zealand forces for the Middle East.

Mr. Byroade: I don't know where these forces could go even if we could get them now.

General Bradley: The original idea was that they would go to the Cairo area. That is probably out now.

General Collins: We could do a lot with some forces in time of war. We could even put them in Iran in time of war to link up with the Turks. If we are going to hold Middle Eastern oil we will have to hold a line in Iran.

Mr. Nitze: We understand that it would take about 10 divisions to hold the mountains in Iran.

General Collins: Where are you going to get 10 divisions?

Mr. Nitze: The Turks say that they will furnish 6.

General Collins: If the Australians and New Zealanders would furnish one each we would only need two more.

General Bradley: There is no disagreement regarding objectives. We can't see a possibility of using U.S. troops in the first couple of years. We do think that something can be done politically and that some military assistance can be provided. The question of defense is a question of feasibility and of money and equipment.

Mr. Nitze: We were conscious of these same difficulties and it was for this reason that we thought that we should look ahead and consider the problems in terms of the situation in 1956.

General Collins: Can anyone assure us that large funds will be available for foreign assistance after next year? Even Ike is talking about a $40 billion cut. There appears to be some doubt about how much of a cut he thinks possible and over what period of time. But even if it were a $20 billion cut spread over three years it would be difficult to maintain a high level of foreign assistance.

General Bradley: Of course we think that Turkey ought to get a high priority on any assistance we can provide.

General Collins: The real hope of Middle Eastern defense is Turkey. If we could get a stable government in Iran, one which would talk turkey with the Turks, we might be able to do something in Iran. It might be possible to do something with the Iraqis but we will have to get permission from Iran before any forces can move in to defend the mountains.

General Bradley: Your memo[3] raises the question of the use of atomic bombs in the defense of the area. We doubt that it would be effective to use them in the mountain passes. . . . We do feel that it is desirable to establish the MEC.

General Collins: Especially if we could persuade the British to give Turkey the right role.

Mr. Nitze: I think we agree that it would be unwise to make commitments regarding U.S. troops or even commitments regarding U.S. aid because of the uncertainty of Congressional appropriations and of our future production schedules. However, we feel that it would be desirable to have a concept which would give us hope of a forward strategy.

[3] Reference is to the Policy Planning Staff memorandum of May 21, Document 74.

General Collins: I don't know the status of that. I have talked with the British about this problem and I think the British are only planning a defense of the inner ring. The trouble with this is that it makes no use of the Turks. The real hope lies in the defense of the outer ring which would make use of the mountains and Turkey's forces. If we don't give the Turks a position of real responsibility there is a danger that the Russians can come down through Iran without involving Turkey. They might try to keep Turkey neutral by saying that they would not attack Turkey if Turkey behaved. If this worked they could easily squeeze us out of the Middle Eastern oil areas.

Mr. Nitze: (Turning to Byroade) Didn't the Turks express grave concern regarding the outflanking move by the Russians?

Mr. Byroade: Surprisingly enough they did not. The Turks say that Russia will never move into the Middle East without taking care of Turkey first. Of course I think they are trying to convince us that the defense of Turkey is the defense of the Middle East.

General Bradley: As to what we can do about that, the first thing seems to be in the political field—the setting up of the MEC. Of course this raises the problem of Egypt and even of Tunisia.

Mr. Nitze: The way in which we set it up depends partly on what we are trying to do. If we are thinking of a forward strategy which involves Turkey, Iran and other forces from the area, then we will want the full participation of the Arab States. This would be especially true if we were trying to avoid the use of U.S. forces.

General Bradley: We have been thinking about an organization of Turkey, France, the U.K. and the U.S. into which the Arab States would be brought as we could bring them in. One of the things that worries us is that if we bring all of the Arab States into the organization at the outset the Arab League becomes a major factor. Another thing that concerns us is that we do not like the suggestion of a three-power steering committee. In our judgment this is not realistic if only because it excludes the Turks.

Mr. Nitze: We in State do not think that the concept of a command organization is realistic. We think the idea of a defense board is a better idea since a real defense of the area is so far in the future.

General Collins: I am not sure that these Turkish divisions are so far in the future. Ambassador Wadsworth tells me that the Turks are willing to create six divisions right now for use in Iran. We have not had a chance to talk to Arnold about this. Personally I am doubtful about our ability to supply the equipment for these divisions. These divisions would constitute an offensive force and would therefore require more equipment than other Turkish divisions.

Mr. Byroade: I talked with Arnold about this when I was in Turkey. It is clear that the U.S. will have to pay for everything for these six divisions.

General Bradley: I don't think we can undertake this on that kind of a commitment.

Mr. Nitze: We have been told that the equipment would cost about $165 million, that annual maintenance cost would run to about $135 million, and that about 10% of the initial equipment outlay, or $16.5 million would be required annually for spare parts and replacements. A preliminary review indicates that these costs are probably too low. We think now that the cost of the original equipment has been underestimated and in light of the mobility that these forces would have to have and that the annual equipment for spare parts and replacements would be higher than the estimate indicates. On the basis of our information we think that the cost might run two or three times as high.

General Collins: Of course these divisions don't need as much as our own. They are really a mountain type of division. On the organizational question, would it be worthwhile in your view to set up a three member steering group consisting of the British, the Turks, and a representative of the Arab States? I think if we could put something like that over we would be on our way to solving some of these problems. I think we ought to take the people in the area into our full confidence.

Mr. Matthews: We have recently received a British paper on this subject.[4] I believe a copy of it was left with you also.

Mr. Nitze: The British have come to the view that the organization should not be a command organization but a planning organization.

General Bradley: Someone has got to take decisions whatever the nature of the organization is. Perhaps the head of it could be called a chairman rather than a commander.

Mr. Nitze: There are two problems here. One concerns the type of organization we want in the Middle East and the other concerns the ad hoc coordination between the U.S., the U.K. and Turkey about what we are really going to do.

General Collins: Could we not agree with the British on the basic concept involved and then let the British go ahead with the planning?

[4] Not printed, but see footnote 1, infra.

Mr. Matthews: Do you mean without any U.S. representation on the planning organization?

General Collins: Yes.

General Bradley: I think the U.S. would have to have representation on the planning staff. As to the three member steering group, the British think that that kind of a set up would make it easy to give coordinated direction. I am afraid, however, that we won't be able to hold the line on a three nation steering group in NATO if we have more than three in the Middle East.

Mr. Matthews: Do you have to have an organization to give guidance?

General Collins: I think that is necessary.

General Bradley: I suppose we could have a planning board with a chairman. That would be solution along the lines followed by the Western Union powers. They had a planning board with a rotating chairmanship.

Mr. Nitze: We have explored the idea of a planning board which would include all the members of the organization. We thought it might be possible to set up a smaller body which would actually do the planning for the Middle East and which would have either a British chairman or a rotating chairmanship. That would leave the problem of coordination among the Western nations on their approach to these problems. We might do that on an ad hoc basis.

General Collins: I think we could do it on an ad hoc and unilateral basis.

Admiral Fechteler: And a covert basis as well.

General Collins: It should be clear that the U.S. is participating because we are the ones who supply military aid.

General Bradley: I think we will have to furnish some of the staff for most of these people don't know how to plan. Of course the British do, but even the Turks are not familiar with military planning in our sense.

Mr. Nitze: I suppose we will also want our staff to work on training problems.

General Collins: Of course we are doing that right now. The thing I am afraid of is getting into the minds of the people the idea that the U.S. will come to their aid in the event of war. If we had the capability for this, I would say "Three cheers!" We simply don't have the capacity.

Mr. Matthews: Of course we also want to avoid the other extreme of giving these people the idea that we don't care about the defense of the Middle East.

General Bradley: That is right. I think we have got to have some U.S. representation in the planning function.

General Collins: We suggested that the U.S. might furnish 10 percent of the staff. I think State has suggested 20 percent.

General Bradley: Some one has suggested that the U.S. should have as many people on the staff as anyone else. In my judgment, the Turks should have the most.

Mr. Nitze: The British paper differs from ours somewhat though it also comes rather close to the ideas we have been considering. It does suggest a Middle Eastern Defense Organization instead of a Middle Eastern Command. It proposes a Supreme Allied Commander Middle East (Designate) instead of a Commander. The paper differs somewhat in that it suggests that the ideas should be communicated to the French and Commonwealth countries and to the Turks after some preliminary U.S.-U.K. discussions. The British propose that their paper should be circulated as a British paper. In other words, they are thinking of a seven-power approach to the problem. The idea then would be to hold diplomatic discussions among the seven to determine how to proceed. We have a question concerning Arab participation. The British propose that Arab participation should be contingent upon their commitment to make facilities available for Middle Eastern defense.

General Bradley: How can they know what they will be prepared to contribute until after a meeting?

Mr. Nitze: We are leaning to the view that we ought to have a political organization first in order to create the preconditions for really doing something in the military field.

General Bradley: Have you considered the problem of Congressional approval? We can probably get some military men together to engage in planning without raising the problem of Congressional approval, but won't Congress insist on approval of a political organization? It would come awfully close to a treaty.

Mr. Byroade: In my view, we ought to keep this a military operation, largely because we can get better cooperation from the military in the Arab countries than we can get from the politicians. The political leaders will want to talk about Israel all the time.

General Collins: What about a military planning organization including the British, Turks, and Arabs?

Mr. Nitze: And no other organization?

General Collins: Oh, we could have a political organization in which everyone would be represented. I was just talking about the military planning job. What Arab country would we want? I suppose Iraq would be the best.

Mr. Matthews: That would make the Saudi Arabians suspicious. They are already worried that Iraq is trying to form an association with Jordan and Syria.

General Bradley: It seems to me that the first step is a meeting of military representatives of all those countries which would be willing to send military representatives. I think it would be better if we could have a political organization first, but I doubt whether we could do this without Congressional approval.

Mr. Nitze: Our thought is really a military organization which would have political importance.

General Bradley: Each military representative would of course receive direction from his government.

Mr. Nitze: Your idea, I take it, is that this group would decide to set up a smaller group to do the planning?

Mr. Matthews: Would the Arabs be interested in a meeting for this purpose?

Mr. Byroade: I don't think Egypt would be. At any rate they would have to know what it was all about. They would have to know that it wasn't a command type of organization and I think they would have to know that we weren't thinking of a British commander.

As you know, I just got back from a long tour through the Middle East. I have not yet been fully de-briefed, but as I size things up, I think there is a tendency around this table to overrate the U.K. position in the area. It seems to me that there is a real possibility that the British are going to get out of the area in a rather disgraceful way. If and when that happens, any idea of a Middle Eastern organization under British command will be no good. I am worried about the future disposition of the British troops now in the area. Where are they going to go? Some of them will probably go to Cyprus and some of them may go to Cyrenaica, but I think a lot of them will go home. Montgomery thinks that all the British troops will get out of the Middle East. He has even gone so far as to suggest the creation of new commands in NATO with Americans at the top. I think he has suggested a new commander-in-chief for the southern region under American leadership which would have the job of protecting the Canal. The Foreign Office says that he is talking through his hat but I am not so sure. One thing I am sure of is that we should not get into the command problem at all at this time and that we ought to confine ourselves to planning board functions. We ought to do the planning on as informal a basis as possible.

General Collins: What you are really saying is that the only power in the area is Turkey, so I am very suspicious of any effort to get the U.S. to do the job. If the British can't do it I think we should get the Turks to do it.

Mr. Byroade: I don't think the Turks will agree to give much leadership in the Arab world. They have now won their big victory by getting into NATO and they are a little more interested in the Middle East than they were, but I don't think they will go very far in providing leadership.

General Collins: The Turks will not fight in Europe.

General Bradley: Montgomery says they will. In fact he suggests that they occupy the Ukraine. (smiling)

General Collins: The fact of the matter is that they won't be fighting in Europe.

Mr. Byroade: I think we have got to watch the Egyptian thing very carefully. Planning is all we can engage in. I was told in Iraq that Iraq will break with Egypt if necessary in order to get going on this matter.

General Bradley: Would the Arabs come in if the Israelis were involved?

Mr. Byroade: No, they would not. Israeli participation will have to come much later and will depend on whether Arab-Israeli problems can be straightened out. In the meantime I am sure in my own mind that we should not build up the Israeli forces. We may have gone too far already.

Mr. Matthews: That is the real worry of the Arab States—not the Soviet Union.

General Bradley: I think we in the Joint Chiefs should consider the U.K. paper if we can get copies of it.

Mr. Matthews: There is some urgency about this since Mr. Eden wants to talk to the Secretary about it when the Secretary is in England.

General Bradley: (Turning to Admiral Fechteler and General Twining) Do you have any comments on this matter?

Admiral Fechteler: I have just been listening. I would like to read the U.K. paper before I express any views.

General Twining: My question is the same as General Collins': Where are we going to get the stuff? From whom are we going to take it away?

Admiral Fechteler: I think we might send the Swedes over to do the job.

General Bradley: The Swedes may be knocking on our door to get into NATO in the next few days.

Mr. Matthews: I would be willing to take a small bet on that—or a large one if you prefer.

. . . .

Mr. Byroade: The Iraqis are in a very emotional frame of mind. They are worried about a communist coup in Iran.

General Bradley: Is it really that serious?

Mr. Byroade: Our people don't think so but perhaps Iraqi intelligence on this matter is better than ours.

Mr. Matthews: I take it that the next step then is for you to consider the British paper.

Mr. Nitze: I hope we can have something more from you before the Secretary leaves.

General Bradley: I might attempt to summarize our views on these matters:

1. The area is of great importance.
2. The U.S. cannot send troops to the area.
3. The U.S. would be willing to contribute to the staff of a Middle Eastern defense organization, largely as a means of securing the participation of others in such an organization.
4. The JCS doubt that it would be practicable or desirable to use atomic weapons in the area.
5. . . .
6. The JCS believe that we should provide what military assistance we can to the countries in the area without upsetting our present priorities. The JCS does not believe that these priorities should be changed. The priorities now are (a) Korea, (b) Indochina, (c) the U.S. and NATO.
7. The organization ought to provide for representation of Turkey and perhaps representatives from the Arab League countries.
8. The JCS agree that British influence in the area is waning rapidly and although Britain is still regarded as responsible power, the JCS increasingly doubt that this view is realistic.
9. The British may want to look to the U.S. to provide leadership but the JCS doubt that this would be realistic. There may be political reasons why the U.S. should assume leadership, however, even though from the military point of view there are good reasons why the U.S. should not assume leadership.
10. The JCS agree that it would not be wise to set up a command in the area at this time.
11. The JCS believe that it would be possible to do some planning for the defense of the area.
12. From the military point of view it would be desirable if a political organization could be established first as a basis for the subsequent establishment of a military organization. Whether this is possible is a question for State to decide. It appears that if Congressional approval of a political organization would be required, it would not be possible to proceed with the creation of a political organization as the first step.
13. The JCS believe that it would be unwise to establish any relationship between the Middle Eastern planning organization and the Standing Group. Such a relationship would lead to trouble with some of the NATO countries. There would be no objection, however, to ad hoc coordination with the British and the Turks. The planning organization would in fact achieve coordination between Middle Eastern defense arrangements and NATO arrangements because of the fact that several countries would be involved in both organizations.

Mr. Nitze: In my opinion, this provides sufficient guidance to proceed with talks with the British on Middle Eastern defense problems. The British want to talk about this problem before the Secretary leaves for England. It might be well for State to wait a day or two before talking to the British in order to give the JCS a chance to read the British paper.

General Bradley: I don't think that it will be necessary to wait if my summary covered the points raised by the British paper.

Mr. Nitze: The summary has covered those points.

General Collins: I think it would be helpful to talk with the British before the Secretary leaves for England.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in the United Kingdom

SECRET WASHINGTON, June 21, 1952—3:15 p. m.

6830. US comments on UK memo re estab of Middle East Defense Org handed Brit Emb office June 20.[1] Substance of comments follows (1) Agree to proceed with dipl prep for the org among the seven-sponsoring powers after US and UK views have been brought into line. Fol development of agreed position among the seven, US, UK, France, and Turkey shld make dipl approach to Arab states, and only after Arab reaction assessed shld further decision be made as to additional steps in establishing MEDO. (2) US prepared to participate in staff of Middle East defense org, but this in no way implies commitment to supply forces for defense of area. (3) US willing continue provide mil assistance to area, but without any present alteration in existing priorities. (4) Agree proposed change in name desirable. (5) Agree functions. (6) Do not believe organizational structure shld be strictly on Command lines or that provision shld now be made for a SACME designate. Prepared to support Brit natl as Chairman of Planning Org. (7) As to Arab participation, do not believe necessary apply qualifying standards. (8) As to Higher Direction, agree to establishment of a Mil Representatives Comite including all participating states. Believe chairmanship of body shld rotate. Opposed to the establishment of Middle East Steering Group with same membership as NATO Standing Group. (9) Agree necessary that Middle East Planning Group shld work with benefit of relevant NATO plans and that a coordinated US–UK–Fr–Turk view shld be brought bear on work of Planning Group as it develops, but believe this can be accomplished by devising ad hoc arrangement for coordinating views of four powers on continuing basis.

[1] On June 18, officers of the British Embassy called at the Department of State with a draft memorandum on the Middle East Defense Organization. The memorandum suggested changing the name from Command Organization to Defense Organization and stated that the British no longer favored delay in establishing the organization in the hope of an early settlement of the Anglo-Egyptian deadlock. They made the following suggestions for setting up the organization: 1) a preliminary and secret exchange of views among the original Seven Powers to agree on a policy before the official conference, 2) a London Conference of the Seven Powers, with Egypt and the six Middle Eastern States concerned (Iraq, Jordan, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, and Lebanon) invited to attend on an equal basis with the original sponsors. It would be made clear to the Middle Eastern States, however, that their position in the organization would depend on the contributions they made. A memorandum of the June 18 conversation and the British memorandum is in Department of State file 780.5/6-1852.

A letter to the Secretary of Defense, dated June 27, not printed, enclosed a copy of the U.S. comments on the British draft memorandum handed to an officer of the British Embassy on June 20. The letter informed the Secretary that the comments were based on the State-Joint Chiefs of Staff discussion of Middle East problems on June 18, and noted that copies of a previous draft of the comments had been informally furnished to the offices of the Secretary of Defense and Joint Chiefs of Staff on June 20. (780.5/6-2352)

No copy of the final comments was attached to the letter to the Secretary of Defense in Department of State files. There is, however, a copy of the original draft of the comments, dated June 19. (780.5/6-1952) A letter from the Deputy Director of the Policy Planning Staff to General Cabell, Director of the Joint Staff, dated June 24, not printed, informed Cabell that the original draft had been revised to take account of two points raised by the Joint Strategic Survey Committee. (PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "S/P papers, May-June, 1952") A memorandum from the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense, dated June 24, not printed, with the formal JCS recommendations on the June 19 draft comments, was transmitted to the Department of State with a letter of June 28 from Foster to Acheson; see footnote 2, Document 80. (780.5/6-2652)

In ans questions Brit representative, Dept officer amplified several pts.

Dept considers substantial amt Arab participation essential to enterprise but Egypt cooperation regarded as indispensable only if other Arab States refuse cooperate without it.

Reason for preferring organizational structure on other than command lines, and postponing provision for SACME primarily feeling this will reduce Arab distrust. Since clear from UK memo that estab operative Command considerable distance off, reasonable avoid difficulties with Arabs which wld be involved in providing for it now.

Same considerations underlie desire eliminate qualifications for membership. Provision of substantial assets not practical issue until later stage in organization's development. Therefore no need to raise problem now.

Believe identification of NATO Standing Group members with MEDO wld cause difficulties both with Northern Eur NATO states and Arab States as well. Agree with Brit objectives, but believe these can be met by means which will create fewer difficulties.

No firm position on Higher Polit Direction. Obviously some such device as UK proposes wld have desirable aspects. However org which included such body as integral part wld raise more serious polit question US.

The Secretary of State to the Department of State [1]

TOP SECRET PRIORITY LONDON, June 27, 1952—1 a. m.

Secto 19. At third bilateral conversation with UK held June 26 on Middle East Defense Organization, Indochina and Korea, Eden, Selwyn Lloyd, Strang, Dixon, Makins, Bowker and Hood were present for British and Secretary, Gifford, Jessup, Nash, Perkins, Nitze, Battle, Kirkpatrick and Palmer for US.

A. MEDO—Eden said he thought we were pretty much agreed on general lines of MEDO but there remained question of how to set it up. UK had thought until recently that Arabs shld be invited soon to join organization. British ME Chiefs of Mission at recent mtg, however, did not believe Arabs wld reply favorably to invitation. They thought therefore there might be something to be said for seven powers setting up organization. If any of Arabs then wanted to come in, they wld be welcomed. Chiefs of Mission felt thing to avoid was confronting Arabs with invitation, which wld necessitate their making decision. This wld probably result in refusal and make later acceptance more difficult.

Secretary said he did not think we were far apart on MEDO. He thought best procedure was to try work out remaining differences between UK and US, fol which French, Turks and Dominions wld be approached. When lines agreed among these seven, we cld then take quiet soundings from Arab states to see how they stand. If they are not willing to join now, we might then go ahead and set up organization. He agreed we shld not issue formal invitation now. Re MEDO itself, US has in mind looser organization than UK paper envisages.[2] Secretary then outlined our position re military reps comite, planning group with British chairman and ad hoc group to coordinate views US, UK, France and Turkey and provide liaison with NATO.

[1] Secretary Acheson was in London June 23-28, on the first leg of a trip to Berlin, Vienna, Dakar, and Rio de Janeiro. He received an honorary degree from Oxford on June 25 and, with his principal advisers, held a number of discussions on various topics with British officials on the other days of his stay. Memoranda of the conversations in London are in the Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 111. For additional information on his trip, see vol. v, Part 2, p. 1544.

SACME shld not be designated until capabilities developed. At that time whole structure might be changed and chairman planning group might become SACME designate.

Dixon asked whether we felt organization shld be set up if results soundings Arab states negative. British Chiefs of Mission had thought Arabs might be more attracted if they saw going concern. Secretary said he felt it depended on nature Arab reply. If Arabs seem merely to be shy it might be best to go ahead. If on other hand they show themselves to be hostile, we might wish reconsider.

Dixon asked how we envisaged planning group operating and whether we intended that chairman PG wld appear to be head of MEDO. Secretary replied he thought it was wiser to have MRC as head of organization. Real work wld be done however by small PG headed by British. It wld be up to British to decide whom they wished to designate as chairman. Chairman wld set up his various sections and recommendations which were worked out wld be placed before MRC.

Dixon said British had thought there was advantage in progressing further at this time toward more formal command structure. They thought this wld give greater appearance of strength to Arab states and might therefore be more attractive to them.

Secretary indicated this was debatable point. We thought there was probably more prospect of attracting Arabs if organizational structure not frozen. Nitze added we felt it desirable maintain flexibility. He stressed importance we attached to getting Arabs into organization. If we are to look toward a forward defense of area, we need Arab cooperation. He thought our whole approach to organizational problem shld be such as to maximize prospects getting Arabs in at beginning and encourage them to think they were participating in erection of organization rather than giving impression they being faced with fait accompli.

Eden said he agreed we shld be flexible when we approached Arabs.

British also raised question standing group. They thought we shld look ahead now to wartime eventuality of NATO SG becoming overall direction agency. There is, moreover, problem of French who have very strong views this question. There may be difficulty in getting them into MEDO at all unless we yield this point.

Secretary pointed out problem presented by Turks. Without Turkish participation MEDO, latter wld have no firm foundation. Turks willing under certain conditions contribute six divisions, which is more substantial contribution than anything French can give. He thought we cld achieve necessary coordination among four powers and liaison with NATO through ad hoc arrangements. If war came, then changes might be necessary. Nitze pointed out views JCS on SG question, particularly possibility creating precedent which wld encourage others such as Canadians to press for participation in higher direction.

Eden indicated he thought we were in substantial agreement on most points. He suggested further conversations by staff to see if agreed paper cld be worked out. Secretary agreed and it was decided that Nitze and Nash shld carry conversations further with Dixon and Bowker. [3] Agreed paper wld be ad referendum US and UK Govts. It was also decided discuss MEDO with French in tomorrow's tripartite.

For Far East discussion Scott joined British group and Ringwalt US group.

The Secretary of State to the Department of State [1]

SECRET PRIORITY LONDON, June 27, 1952—10 p. m.

Secto 24. Re Secto 18, [2] following paper on MEDO has been agreed here by US and UK ad referendum both governments:

"Nomenclature.

"1. It would be preferable that the organization to be set up in the Middle East should be termed a 'defense organization' rather than 'command organization' since, particularly in so far as the Middle East states are concerned, the former name is likely to have more psychological appeal. The term Allied Middle East defense organization (MEDO) is therefore used throughout this memorandum.

"Background.

"2. In September, 1951 the seven sponsoring powers (UK, USA, France, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Turkey), agreed that a Middle East defense organization (MEDO) should be established.[3] Early this year, it was agreed that the establishment and development of MEDO should be carried out in two phases and closely geared throughout to the Paris declaration of November 1951. In the first phase, the organization should be a planning, coordinating and liaison organization: In the second phase it should evolve into a fully-fledged defense organization. It was decided that an official inaugural conference of the seven sponsoring powers should be held in London in March to discuss the setting-up of MEDO, but it was later agreed that this conference should be postponed in the hope that the new government in Egypt might in due course develop a more favorable attitude towards the whole concept.

"Present Situation.

"3. We do not consider that we should delay the plans for the establishment of a MEDO any longer in the hope of any early issue of the Anglo-Egyptian deadlock. Thus, it is desirable that the seven sponsoring powers should now reach early agreement on:

"(a) The form, and functions of MEDO;

"(b) The tactics to be pursued towards the Middle East states.

"The Functions of the MEDO.

"4. The main functions of the organization will be as outlined in the Paris declaration i.e.

"(a) To draw up plans for the defense of the Middle East and to be a center of cooperative effort for defense purposes.

"(b) To plan for, and provide the Middle East states with, assistance in the form of training and advice.

"(c) To coordinate requests by Middle East states for arms and equipment.

"(d) To make plans for the operations in war of all forces within, or to be introduced into, the area and to coordinate them with the operations of the adjoining NATO command in the Eastern Mediterranean and Asia Minor.

"(e) To reduce such deficiencies as exist at present in organization and capacity for the defense of the area.

"Structure of the Organization.

"5. The organization should be kept flexible and as small as is consistent with:

"(a) The need for efficient planning;

"(b) The participation of a number of different countries;

[3] For documentation, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, pp. 1 ff.

"(c) A smooth evolution into full defense organization which is the ultimate aim. The organization would consist of:

"(a) Military representatives committee
"(b) Planning group. The organization would be established in Cyprus unless some more suitable site became available.

"Military Representatives Committee.

"6. The military representatives committee would consist of representatives of all states participating in the organization. It would be responsible for the general direction of the planning group and would meet twice a year, or more often if required. The chairmanship of the committee would rotate.

"The Planning Group.

"7. The planning group will be composed of planning teams supplied by the participating powers. In view of the existence of a British Middle East Command, the contribution the UK will make to MEDO and her responsibilities in the Middle East, the head of the planning group should be British. The group would be divided into appropriate sections to handle e.g. logistics, intelligence and operations, administration and plans, training, coordination of requests for military aid and equipment; liaison with nonparticipating Middle East states.

"8. The military representatives and the members of the planning group would obtain direction and guidance from their respective governments and report to them, pending the evolution of a fully integrated defense organization.

"Relationship With NATO.

"9. The necessary coordination between Middle East and NATO planning will be achieved by appropriate liaison in Washington.

"Participation of Middle East States.

"Egypt

"10. Egypt was invited in October 1951 to join a Middle East defense organization as a founder member on an equal footing with the present seven sponsoring powers: Despite her rejection of the proposals this offer remains open. Egypt's eventual participation in the defense organization is, moreover, very important in view of the strategic facilities which she can offer on her territory.

"Israel

"11. Although Israel clearly has a valuable contribution to make to the common task of Middle East defense by the provision of forces and facilities, her inclusion in the defense organization as a full member, at least for the time being, would destroy any chance of obtaining the cooperation of the Arab States. Her exclusion is, therefore, inevitable at this stage; the Israeli Government understands this.

"The Other Arab States

"12. These states are all directly interested and in varying degrees facilities (e.g. bases or transit rights) will be required from all of them. Taking a long view, no satisfactory defense arrangements for the Middle East can be made without the active and willing cooperation of these states. Whilst this cooperation might be achieved by some form of liaison between the organization and each Middle East state individually, it would be much more satisfactory if, in the initial planning stages, the states would actually participate in the organization.

"Tactics to be Adopted Towards the Arab States.

"It is unlikely, however, that the Arab States would in present circumstances accept a formal invitation to participate in the organization. Having once refused, it will be the more difficult for them to change their attitude later or to cooperate in any way with the organization. The British representatives in the Middle East consider that the establishment of an organization will be regarded by the Arabs as a token of the sincerity of Allied determination to defend the Middle East, and that the mere fact of its establishment would tend to attract Arab cooperation.

"The right line of approach to the Arab States would thus seem to be to inform them of the plans of the sponsoring powers, to indicate that we should welcome Arab association with the organization and that if, as seems probable, the Arab reaction is shy rather than hostile, we should then go ahead with the establishment of the organization and hope that as it proceeds with its work the Arab States will tend, individually or collectively, to cooperate progressively with it.

"Future Action.

> "(a) Exchange of views on the UK proposals between the sponsor powers through diplomatic channels;
> "(b) As soon as the sponsor powers have reached agreement an approach should be made to the Arab States to inform them of the intention of the sponsoring powers to establish MEDO in Cyprus and to sound out their willingness to join that organization in order to plan for the defense of the Middle East."

The Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Lovett)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 10, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I enclose for consideration by the Department of Defense a copy of Secto 24, London, June 27, 1952[1] which contains a paper on the Middle East Defense Organization agreed to ad referendum by the United States and United Kingdom following discussions between members of the group accompanying the Secretary of State and the British in London. This paper is a revision of the earlier United Kingdom draft memorandum on the same subject, which was modified to take account of a number of changes suggested by the United States in the course of the discussions. Although Mr. Foster's letter of June 28, 1952 forwarding the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the United Kingdom memorandum [2] had not been received at the time these discussions occurred, it will be noted that the present revision of that paper meets several of the points raised by the Joint Chiefs.

There is also attached a copy of a memorandum handed to this Department July 7 [3] by officers of the British Embassy in which the United Kingdom proposes certain changes in the draft of June 27. Also attached is a draft reply to the British proposals, [4] in which we indicate that the suggested changes are not acceptable and ask that the draft of June 27 be circulated.

In the opinion of the Department of State, the draft of June 27 provides a suitable basis for the proposed initial exchange of views among the sponsoring powers. In the course of such exchange of views, the United States Government can make such further suggestions with respect to the Middle East defense arrangements as may seem desirable. The paper as now drafted does not, in any case, provide a definitive blue-print of the proposed Organization, and there will be need for further deliberation before the Military Representatives Committee is convened or a planning group established. Moreover, the United States has already indicated to the United Kingdom that after the Arab States have been approached the situation should be reassessed before further steps are taken. There will thus be further opportunity for the United States to propose changes in the Organization as presently outlined, particularly where these changes are essentially of a supplementary nature.

[2] Neither the letter nor the Joint Chiefs of Staff views under reference here is printed. The letter concluded by saying that Foster believed further discussion between the Departments of State and Defense would be necessary prior to discussion of the Allied Military Command with the British.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum, dated June 24, requested deletion of a section in the original June 19 Department of State draft saying that the United States would question the wisdom of proceeding with the establishment of the Middle East Command in the absence of reasonable prospects of participation by at least some of the Arab States. (780.5/6-2852)

Further information on this topic is in telegram 6830 to London, Document 77.

[4] The draft reply, entitled "Proposed US Comments on Revised MEDO Paper of June 27, and UK proposals for changes in that paper, dated July 7," is not printed. The U.S. paper considered the changes proposed by the British in paragraphs 6 and 9 inconsistent with the U.S. view that coordination among the United States, United Kingdom, France, and Turkey, as members of NATO and participants in MEDO, should be achieved by ad hoc arrangements outside of MEDO.

With regard to the paragraph on the Arabs, the United States considered the problem of the approach to the Arab States of crucial importance and planned to give it additional study, and did not want to take a final position on the matter without consultation with the Chiefs of Mission in the Arab capitals. The final paragraph of the paper ended by saying, "Moreover, we are not prepared at this time to make a commitment to proceed with the establishment of the organization regardless of Arab sentiment. As the Secretary clearly stated to Mr. Eden, we would have serious reservations about proceeding and would wish to reassess the situation if the Arabs appear hostile to the Organization. In our opinion, the language of the draft of June 27, which provides essential flexibility on this point, should be retained." (PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Near and Middle East, 1952-3")

Subject to the concurrence of the Department of Defense, this Department proposes that the United Kingdom should be informed, in the general terms of the attached memorandum, that the changes proposed in their paper of July 7 are not acceptable, but that the United States approves the draft of June 27 as the basis for an initial exchange of views among the sponsoring powers. The United Kingdom is most anxious to circulate the memorandum to the other sponsoring powers, and we would be grateful to receive the views of the Department of Defense as soon as possible.

Sincerely yours,

For the Acting Secretary of State:
H. FREEMAN MATTHEWS
Deputy Under Secretary

Memorandum by the Acting Regional Planning Adviser, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Hoskins), to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 25, 1952.

---

[1] The source text is Attachment I to a memorandum by Hoskins to Byroade, dated July 25, not printed, and is a revision of an Apr. 7 paper on the same subject, Document 67. The covering memorandum suggests that since too many discussions with the British and French in the past had foundered because NEA had not held discussions and come to agreement with EUR and the Department of Defense and other agencies of the U.S. Government, no more discussions should be held with the other powers until agreement had been reached with other parts of the Department of State and other agencies. (Secretary's Letters, lot 56 D 459, N)

Attachment II to the July 25 memorandum, "Suggestion of a possible solution of two NE problems: A stronger regional defense and a Syrian-Israeli peace", is not printed.

Part I—General Comments

Major Impressions

(1) The following major impressions of my recent trip to the Middle East confirm and emphasize various points outlined in Part I of BOP's April 7th memorandum, especially paragraphs 5 and 6. These impressions may be summarized as follows:

(a) There is a continuation of the gradual deterioration of the free world position in the Middle East as reported over the past several years after each of my trips to the field. My recent trip is no exception since this time I must again record a lower standing not only of the position of the US, of the UK and of the French but now also of Turkey as well. Turkey's weakened position, which can be temporary, stems from the fact that a growing number of people in the Arab states feel that Turkey has decided to orient itself heavily toward Europe and NATO rather than primarily as a Middle East and Asian power. Furthermore, they feel that Turkey has been induced to accept and to help enforce decisions, several also of which she had had no part in making, which are not in their opinion, in their long term interest. For the moment, and only in some Arab circles it should be clear, Turkish support of any idea or plan is almost the "kiss of death" and our propaganda people broadcasting to the area should bear this in mind.

(b) The tides of neutralism and nationalism, with which communism has successfully allied itself to an increasing degree, continue to rise. One impressive development since my trip last year is the surprising increase in the number of acknowledged communists in the Middle East and their growing influence, despite the Moslem religion which many, including King Ibn Saud, felt would form an effective barrier.

(c) Distrust of the motives of the western powers in proposing a Middle East Command (MEC) is general throughout various Arab states and is confirmed by their unwillingness even to consider joining any type of MEC which puts foreign troops on their soil in peace time, especially prior to any settlement of the Egyptian issue.

(d) There is little if any constructive progress in recent months to report toward the solution of the continuing difficulties in Morocco and Tunisia, in Egypt and the Sudan, in the Arab States and Israel, in Iran or in Kashmir. Several of these issues, including Egypt and Iran, are now even more bogged down than they were, with no prospect of immediate solution. This also confirms BOP's estimate in paragraph 9 of the April 7th memorandum.

(e) US influence throughout the Moslem world has been weakened and continues to be weakened further:

> By our continuing moral, material and military support of Israel. Greater and more favorable Israeli publicity in the US has continued to be supplemented at intervals by well publicized vice-presidential or cabinet officer speeches which stress Israel as the sole or main bastion of democracy in the Middle East. The fact that such speeches do not necessarily represent the official views of our government is completely overlooked, and for different reasons, by both Arabs and Jews in the area.

By our apparent support for what Arabs consider outdated and undemocratic colonial policies of France and the UK which run contrary to the growing feeling for nationalism in various parts of the area.

By a gradual but growing distrust of US policy, not only, it should be noted, in the Arab world but also in Israel. This is reflected in a continuing diminution of US prestige. Starting with disappointment at American policy, this feeling has grown to dislike and distrust and now in some cases has reached outright hatred of the US.

(f) At the same time, and despite the unfavorable facts described above, it is only fair to say that there are two mitigating factors which continue to operate in our favor:

Whether we admit the fact or not, there remains a considerable number of individuals, mainly those educated in American institutions in the area, who continue their effort to differentiate between the US Government and the American people. This small but informed group continues to have an almost subconscious faith in the basically sound qualities of the American people and of our ultimate support for the efforts of dependent peoples everywhere to win their independence. They may not express such views publicly but they will still do so in private conversations with Americans whom they trust.

There is a recognition, at times grudgingly given, of the ultimate economic and military strength of the US as we eventually demonstrated it in two world wars. They admit the success of our efforts to strengthen Western Europe, Greece and Turkey against the USSR and against communism generally. This admission exists despite our failure in China and our lack of evident success to date in Korea.

Basic US Policies Now In Force

(2) Our basic American policies in the NEA area, which in our interest have tended to follow the middle-of-the-road, have signally failed to satisfy either side—either France and the UK or the African-Asian powers:

(a) We continue to consider France the primary power in North Africa which must be supported to the greatest extent possible. On the one hand we have not felt able to give France the blank check she wanted us to give in advance of our knowing what reform program and what timetable she planned to offer. Nor on the other hand have we felt we could support extreme nationalist demands for immediate independence in either Morocco or Tunisia, despite local nationalist pressures for early self-government and for the eventual right to ultimate independence.

(b) The UK, in the view of our Department of Defense, still has primary responsibility for stability and military defense in the Middle East. However, we must in all honesty recognize and attempt to reassess

—the growing military weakness of the UK made more difficult by her unsolved crises in Iran and in Egypt and —the increasing unpopularity and distrust of the UK on the part of the governments and the people of the area.

(c) Meanwhile, our Government, without wishing to take on any added military responsibility in the area, has made intermittent and at times inconsistent efforts to use its influence with both France and the UK and the local governments to assist in increasing stability in the area.

(3) Our relative lack of success with those policies suggests a need again to reappraise them and to analyze alternative possibilities.

Dilemma of United States Policy

(1) [sic] We still have, as pointed out in the April 7th memorandum, an unreconciled divergence of views within the State Department between two basic US needs:

(a) Support of France and the UK wherever possible in the face of a threat of a diminution of their overseas influence or territories vis-à-vis the USSR and a growth of communism in the NEA area.

(b) Keeping and increasing, where possible, the goodwill and friendship of African-Asian peoples, including those seeking opportunities for greater self-government and economic improvement.

(5) Furthermore our Department of Defense is still of the opinion that:

(a) As a result of our military commitments to Korea, Indo-China and NATO, further calls for US military assistance are greater than our present capabilities.

(b) The tax burden to the US of building areas of military strength in places other than where we are already committed is as great at the present time as to make it politically undesirable for us to expand further our promises to supply military equipment to other areas, especially if such initial deliveries are likely to become continuing ones for an indefinite future period.

(c) The US cannot take primary defense responsibility for any additional areas of the world. However, in view of the importance of the Middle East to US security, token US forces, to gain political objectives, may at least be considered in specific instances.

(d) The French and especially the UK must not be allowed to reduce their military responsibilities, by transferring them to the US, e.g., as the UK did in Greece and Turkey in 1947. Hence the US Defense desire is not to weaken anywhere abroad our two strongest NATO allies—France and the United Kingdom.

The Growing Need for Increased US Leadership in NEA Areas

(6) Despite our preference for no further and no greater foreign responsibilities, the US is faced with the lessened capabilities of

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

France and of the UK to supply leadership in the NEA area because of their reduced military, material and personnel resources. This would seem to make a US assumption of greater leadership in the NEA area increasingly essential if not inevitable. Our military may not feel we can take on any new commitments but at least we should recognize the changed situation and the danger of a power vacuum in the Middle East which, whether we like it or not, will be filled by someone.

(7) The free world would welcome a real and recognizable success in the Middle East as a desirable boost to morale, since at present it is recognized as an "area of weakness" and not an "area of strength".

A Possible Alternative US Policy—Building "Areas of Neutrality"

(8) Before committing ourselves to a policy of increased US leadership aimed particularly at making the Middle East an "area of strength", we should consider an alternative and less expensive policy. This might be described as building in the Middle East, and perhaps in other important parts of the world, "areas of neutrality".

(9) For one thing we must face up to the growing impossibility, financially and politically, of the US being able to supply arms to every country of the free world on the scale that has been found necessary in Greece and Turkey, e.g., $426 million (1947-1951) to Turkey.

(10) If it were possible, could we build "areas of neutrality" which are benevolently directed toward the free world? Politically and financially such a policy would be attractive since it would cost less in money and materials, especially military, then to build "areas of strength". Of course such a policy would still require that the US maintain a strong military position at home. This would mean that, in addition to our own military forces, we would continue to stockpile strategic materials and atomic weapons as at present, supported by a strong NATO and, to be hoped, by a growing area of benevolent neutrality in other parts of the non-Soviet world.

(11) Obviously the danger in pursuing such a policy would be the loss from time to time of neutral areas to subversive communist activities, such as have already occurred in the Balkans and in Czechoslovakia.

(12) Despite its attractive features this alternative plan would on balance seem to be too dangerous a policy for the US to pursue in the Middle East. This is especially true in view of Russia's need for large proven oil reserves which are available in the Middle East and which are at least not yet known to exist in Soviet territory.

Comments on Three Important Problems in the Middle East Area

(13) Among various problems in the area, there are three important related ones that are pressing for solution:

(a) Settlement of the Arab refugees from Palestine in neighboring Arab states.

(b) Plans for a stronger regional defense against communism and a possible attack by the USSR.

(c) Settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict over Palestine.

(14) As to (a), the Arab refugees, a great deal of planning and considerable progress has been made looking toward a settlement of this problem. At the moment the prospects for a solution look brighter than at any time in the past. Ambassador Blandford reports that the Syrian Government has given him assurances that they will settle approximately 500,000 Palestinian refugees in Syria and that the Yarmuk project in Jordan is likely to go through, which can settle eventually another 125,000 refugees. If these two projects materialize to the extent anticipated, the back of the Palestine refugee problem will have been broken. Furthermore, since a settlement of the Arab refugee problem, (a), is an absolute prerequisite to the solution of (b) and (c) above, it is most important that we do everything possible to assure that these two projects are agreed upon and carried to successful completion as rapidly as possible.

(15) As to (b), regional defense, the concept of the Middle East Command (MEC) as proposed last fall was not acceptable to Egypt and, as indicated above, was also viewed with varying degrees of misgiving and distrust by various Arab states. Aside from a feeling that this military command concept was being forced on them, the Arab states had two other objections—their unwillingness to have foreign troops stationed on their soil in peacetime and their objection to a Supreme Commander of United Kingdom nationality. The MEC plan has, I understand, now been replaced by a different concept, the Middle East Defense Organization (MEDO), a planning and training concept on which State and Defense have agreed. This revised concept, with a name that plays down the command idea, when finally worked out, may well prove to be considerably more acceptable to the Arab states of the area.

(16) As to (c), settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict over Palestine, no progress has recently been made. In fact, before the US can make any substantial progress toward a settlement in the Middle East, several steps must be taken in this country. Besides stopping strong pro-Zionist statements by vice-presidential and cabinet members, a definite brake must be successfully applied to Israel's ability to put sufficient pressure through American Zionists on the US Government to obtain the funds it needs for current operations. No doubt some funds must be given but a quid pro quo should be obtained in connection with each such financial advance. In Israel's own self-interest we must insist that Israel take definite steps to put its financial house in order so that both of us can look eventually toward eliminating the necessity for further US aid. A first step in this direction was taken when, in return for recent financial assistance amounting to $24 million to meet pressing current debts, Israel agreed to a mission headed by Mr. Mikesell to study Israel's financial situation and especially to get more facts and figures on its current unfunded debt. We need to be more frank in insisting that further American financial assistance to Israel can only be given when the end result will be to put Israel in a better position to control its expenditures and hence to become economically stronger. This in turn will allow Israel to make certain financial concessions to the Arabs which should help Israel to attain peace with its Arab neighbors. Israel will of necessity remain a "remittance state" until she has attained peace with her neighbors, has reduced her military expenditures and has put herself in a position to develop more normal trade relations with nearby countries.

An initial step in this direction is now under consideration. It is the unfreezing in Israel of Arab refugee bank balances. The next step that would logically follow would be at least preliminary discussions over the compensation Israel will pay for property of Palestinian Arabs taken over by the new state. Some action along these lines becomes increasingly advisable in view of the results Israel has recently gained in obtaining compensation from the West German Government for the property of Jews who were killed or driven out of Germany.

(17) At the same time we must keep equally alert for chances to press Israel's Arab neighbors to a more realistic appreciation of the fact that Israel is there and is likely to remain there for some time. We must urge them to show a greater flexibility and a greater willingness to enter direct negotiations than they have shown to date.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 8, 1952.

Subject: Meeting with the President

Participants: The President
Mr. Charles Murphy—White House
Mr. Henry Byroade—NEA

I called on the President at 11:15, Friday, August 8th, at his request, to discuss general problems in my area. Charlie Murphy was present during the discussion.

The President said he was eager to hear my views on the general Middle East situation. I expressed my appreciation for the opportunity to discuss certain of these problems with him which I felt might affect the security of the United States in the future. I listed the problems of most concern in the area which were the French problem in North Africa, the Egyptian situation, the Iranian situation, the question of Kashmir, the general range of Arab-Israeli problems, the Greek political and economic situation, and the question of possible defense organization for the area. I also referred to the current flare up between the Greeks and the Bulgars over the island in the Evros River.

As to the area in general, I stated that I knew the President was familiar with the general instability and fears throughout the area. I stated that fear of communism and Russia was not always first priority in the minds in some of the countries. I stated that some parts of the area reminded me too much of the China situation for comfort. [1] In many places there was little contact between the government and people and no feeling of confidence on their part in their governments. Some of them could not stay in power but for the support of their army. I stated in this situation the position of the Three Powers was not good. The French position in North Africa and in the area under their former mandates was not good. The British position, which I felt was far more serious, was in my opinion slowly deteriorating. I stated that the U.S. position, primarily but not entirely due to the Israeli problem, was not very good either.

I referred again to the British situation, saying that I thought there was a great chance, in view of their deteriorating political position in the area, coupled with their general economic and financial situation, that we would see a general withdrawal of the British from the Middle East. If this happened the United States would be faced with some very fundamental decisions as to what we could do to help fill the vacuum thus created and maintain and strengthen the U.S. position in the area.

[1] In 1946, Colonel Byroade was assistant to Gen. George C. Marshall, Military Attaché in China and U.S. Member of the Executive Headquarters, at the time of the Marshall Mission to China.

The President agreed with this general analysis, indicating that he thought the United States would soon face just such a set of circumstances. He stated that he was not surprised I had not returned from my trip in an optimistic mood.

The President inquired about Kashmir, saying that he had just heard India had made some move on this problem. I told him the only recent development was the agreement of India and Pakistan to meet on a Ministerial level near the end of this month in Geneva. I told him I was not very hopeful that a solution would be found at that meeting. I stated that recently Pakistan had made what appeared to us to be a good offer but that Nehru had refused. The President stated he wished Nehru would take care of problems such as this . . . . He referred to a recent attempt by Nehru to have other states join in a neutrality block. I stated we wished now to await the outcome of the Geneva discussions before deciding what to do next. I stated there was some chance we might feel a meeting between the two Prime Ministers would be in order and that we might need his help in arranging such a meeting. The President said he would be glad to help.

I told the President the situation in Egypt looked a little better each day. It was too early to predict what future trends in Egypt would be but there was some indication that the group in power might be willing to separate the question of the King's title to the Sudan and the question of the Suez Base and the defense of the area. If this would occur the Egyptians were almost certain to make a request on the West for military equipment. The President stated that such a trend in Egypt would indeed be fortunate and would have a good effect on the rest of the area.

I told the President the situation in Iran was extremely serious and that there was a chance the country would be lost to the communists. I described the situation there in some detail, ending with my disappointment that the British had found themselves unable to act upon our last suggestion for over a week's time and that before we could get together on a joint plan Mosadeq had seen fit to make public an unfortunate note to the British. The President was quite critical of the British for this type of usual delay on urgent problems. He stated that if it proved impossible to get together with the British on Iran we would have to see what we could do unilaterally.

The President referred to his interest in further development of parts of the area, principally along the lines of agriculture. He referred specifically to the river valleys in Iraq and Egypt. I added that I thought there were also possibilities of development in Northern Syria and that this might be connected with finally unblocking the refugee resettlement problem. The President agreed that this was one of the most important things to unstick in the whole area and hoped we would be successful.

I then told the President I wished to discuss with him at some length the Israeli financial problem. [2] I told him of the request for emergency assistance that had been presented the first week I took office and of the fact that this request had been met. I stated that upon my return, Sharett was here asking for additional emergency assistance and described the line we had taken with Sharett. This was briefly to the effect that the time had come when the United States must insist upon being apprised of the full details of the Israeli financial situation and of the methods they propose to insure that frequent and unexpected crises did not continue to occur. The President stated that he had taken the same line with Sharett. I gave the President some of the main points contained in Mikesell's report and indicated that we had come to the conclusion along with Mikesell that certain conditions should be attached to any further United States assistance. I outlined briefly what these were and told the President of the status of the note which we hope the Israel Government will present to us to indicate their commitment to take the necessary measures. The President fully agreed with the method of handling the situation. I told the President that I felt the American Jewish community in general would agree with the action we were taking and that I knew a large proportion of these people felt that it was time for the United States to adopt a sterner attitude regarding our assistance to Israel. The President indicated he believed this to be the case and stated he had lost no opportunity of informing American Jewish representatives that this was going to be our attitude in the future. The President said he fully approved the line we were taking.

At the close of the meeting, the President again indicated his deep concern about Iran and pointed out on his globe the extreme significance of the loss of that country to the West.

As I was leaving, Murphy indicated to the President that I had a copy of Sparkman's letter to the President on the question of the release of the International Oil Cartel Report and that we had the matter under study. [3] Murphy also indicated to the President that we had been quite helpful in working with them on the Democratic Platform on questions affecting the Middle East. The President interrupted to say that he felt certain that we should release the oil report promptly, or at least a major portion of the Report. I indicated that the Report would undoubtedly be quite harmful in our area but that I understood he was faced with implications of a broader nature on the question of the release of the Report.

The Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews) to the Secretary of Defense (Lovett) [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 15, 1952.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you know, our military planning has always considered the British responsible for the defense of the Middle East, just as our political thinking has always allotted to the British primary responsibility for maintaining stability in the Near Eastern area.

However, I understand that current British plans envisage the defense only of a portion of Turkey and of the Mediterranean seacoast from Lebanon south. This of course would permit enemy occupation of the greater part of the Near East and of virtually all of its oil resources. [2]

The Department of State believes that the time has come when we should reasssess this situation to determine whether a forward defense of the Near East, designed to protect at least a portion of the oil and give greater protection to our strategic bases, could not be undertaken. It is fully recognized that neither troops nor equipment are presently available to the Western Powers to make such a defense possible, but we need not assume that this will be the case indefinitely. It is our thought that we should begin now to prepare for the time, which might come in 1956 or 1957, when other commitments may permit the furnishing of equipment in significant quantities to the Near East.

It is at least theoretically feasible to count on raising defense forces within the states of the Near East which, with adequate training and equipment, might themselves play the major role in their own defense. Such a development would of course require progress in our political relationship with those states, but would raise fewer problems than would a defense strategy which required the stationing of substantial numbers of Western troops in the area. From the political point of view, it would therefore be desirable to maximize the contribution of the Near East States to the defense of the area. Such a contribution would, of course, be possible only if we are able and willing to make available the necessary equipment and training assistance.

[1] This letter was attached to a memorandum, dated Aug. 6, not printed, from Byroade to Matthews. According to the memorandum, the letter had been discussed in draft by John Ferguson with Rear Admiral H. Page Smith of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, who considered the request desirable and indicated that the letter was appropriate.

The memorandum stated that the study under reference in the letter was essential because "in spite of our long-standing concern with the problem of Middle East defense and the mounting evidence that it is beyond British capabilities to defend any substantial part of the area, there has been no US study of what would be required in terms of force and equipment to effect a forward defense of the Middle East." (780.5/8-1552)

As a basis for future decisions, I think we need first of all an objective military estimate of what would be required for a forward defense of the area in terms of divisions, aircraft, naval supporting forces, etc., and an estimate of the cost of the equipment of these forces. Having such an estimate, we would then be in a position to decide whether the enterprise is within our forseeable means and those of our allies and to what extent the investment would be worthwhile relative to competing defense needs in other parts of the world. Without such an estimate, we cannot decide what policy objectives we should set for ourselves in the Near East.

I suggest, therefore, that you request the Joint Chiefs of Staff to undertake a preliminary study of the essential requirements, from the military point of view, for the forward defense of the Middle East, which for these purposes, I suggest, should be considered to include Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, the Arab States and Israel. [3]

Sincerely yours,

H. FREEMAN MATTHEWS

[3] A reply from the Secretary of Defense, dated Oct. 28, not printed, informed the Department of State that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had conducted planning regarding military force requirements for defense of the Middle East and had tried to obtain British intentions for fulfilling their responsibilities in that area, but that the question was extremely complex. The Joint Chiefs of Staff were at that time making a further estimate of requirements as part of the development of a Joint Strategic Objectives Plan for 1956, and expected the plan to be completed early in 1953. The concluding paragraph of the letter reads: "The Joint Chiefs of Staff will continue to study and reassess this problem, and you will be informed at a later date as progress is made in current studies and reassessments." Memorandum of Conversation, by the Politico-Military Adviser of the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Daspit)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 28, 1952.

Subject: MEDO

On August 26 representatives of the Department of State, the Department of Defense and the Joint Staff met at 3:45 to discuss certain points raised in the JCS memorandum [1] on the UK proposals for the establishment of MEDO (Secto 24, London June 27, 1952) [2] as a preliminary to the preparation of U.S. comments on the UK proposals for circulation to the several sponsoring powers. Present at the meeting were:

Maj. Gen. A. P. Fox, USA, JSSC
Maj. Gen. E. J. Rogers, Jr., USAF, JSSC
R. Adm. W. F. BOone, USN, JSSC
R. Adm. H. P. Smith, USN, OSD–OFMA
Capt. E. Grant, USN, OSD–OFMA
Cdr. R. K. Kaufman, USN, JSSC
Mr. J. D. Jernegan, State Department
Mr. J. H. Ferguson, State Department
Mr. A. B. Daspit, State Department
Mr. P. T. Hart, State Department
Mr. W. Stabler, State Department

Mr. Daspit opened the conversation by stating that the Department of State had studied the memorandum of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which suggested that four elements should be included in any US position on the MEDO. The proposals made in paragraphs 3a and 3c [3] of the memorandum were obviously desirable but the

[1] The Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum of July 29 is not printed. (780.5/7–2952) It was enclosed in a letter dated Aug. 11 from the Deputy Secretary of Defense which informed the Department of State that Frank Nash, Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, was prepared to discuss the matter with any representatives the Department might designate. (780.5/8–1152)

[3] Paragraph 3a of the July 29 memorandum stated that the Joint Chiefs of Staff believed it should be made clear that the planning function of the Middle East Defense Organization should not include plans "for the operations in war of forces which may be introduced into the area but which are not specifically allocated for the defense thereof."

Paragraph 3c suggested that paragraph 8 of Secto 24 was ambiguous on the source of military guidance for the planning group, as to whether it would come from the Military Representatives Committee or their respective governments. The Joint Chiefs of Staff believed the planning group should receive military guidance from the Military Representatives Committee.

Department of State was not altogether clear as to the other two points:

1. They were not certain as to what was meant by a "Middle East defense council" and the exact character of the Allied Planning Group as suggested in paragraph 3d of the Joint Chiefs' memorandum.[4]
2. They were not entirely clear as to whether the Joint Chiefs actually desired the setting up of a Steering Group of the UK, Turkey and one Arab State which they suggested as a negotiating position in paragraph 3b(3) of their memorandum.[5]

In addition, the State Department desired to know Defense's views on the French Aide-Mémoire[6] which proposed that MEDO should receive its direction and guidance through the NATO Standing Group in Washington and the method which should be used in dealing with this proposal.

In reply to the first point raised by the State Department, General Fox stated that he was not sure as to whether the proposal for an Allied Planning Group and a Middle East defense council was intended as an alternative to the MEDO proposal, to be adopted in the event the Arab States were unwilling to participate in MEDO, or as an outright substitute approach to the general problem of Middle East defense. There appeared to be agreement as between the representatives of State and Defense that the approach to the Arab States should be sufficiently flexible and informal to permit the adoption of various alternative courses in the further development of MEDO and that, depending on the nature of their reaction to the initial approach, an invitation to the Arab States to attend a "council" or "conference" to discuss problems of Middle East defense might be considered. There was no disagreement as to the desirability of the Western Powers making plans for the defense of the Middle East even though there should be no Arab participation in a MEDO. It was pointed out however that such planning might be accomplished in a number of different ways and the State Department representatives emphasized that it would be a mistake to advertise the creation of an exclusively Western Planning Group to study Middle East defense problems.

[4] Paragraph 3d stated that the Joint Chiefs of Staff considered the importance of the Middle East to be such that planning should proceed regardless of whether the Arab States decided to participate in a Middle East Defense Organization at that time. It reads, in part, "They are of the opinion that such planning arrangements in the form of an Allied Planning Group might lead to the eventual participation of some or all of the Arab States in the broader politico-military MEDO envisaged. To this end, the Middle East states should, simultaneously with the establishment of an Allied Planning Group, be invited to join with the Western nations in the formation of a Middle East defense council to study the over-all problem of a cooperative defense for this area."

[5] Paragraph 3b(3) reads that the Joint Chiefs of Staff "propose that consideration be given to the establishment of a steering group consisting of one representative each from the United Kingdom, Turkey, and one of the Arab States."

[6] Not printed. (780.5/8-1652) For a discussion of the French position, see Document 87.

In reply to the second point raised by the State Department, General Fox stated that the JCS was fundamentally opposed to having the NATO Steering Group function for MEDO and to having any Steering Group in MEDO with more than three states represented. The particular suggestion for a Steering Group to be composed of the UK, Turkey and one Arab State was put forward as a suggested negotiating position, since the Joint Chiefs were convinced that the question of a Steering Group would undoubtedly arise in the course of the negotiations looking toward the establishment of the organization. He thought however that the Joint Chiefs agreed that it would be desirable, if possible, to avoid the establishment of a Steering Group of any sort during the initial planning stage of MEDO.

There was entire agreement as to the unacceptability of the proposal in the French Aide-Mémoire that the NATO Standing Group should also provide direction for MEDO, and the discussion centered on the problem of how best to persuade the French to drop their proposal. The State Department could of course inform the French through a diplomatic note that the US rejected the proposal but there was some doubt as to whether the French would accept this as the final word on the subject. Another way would be to hold a three power meeting (US, UK and France) at which the French could be told by a ranking US military officer that the proposal was completely unacceptable; in the view of the State Department this procedure was likely to have greater effect. However, there was danger that news of such a meeting would leak to the other sponsoring powers and to the Arab States, with adverse effects. On balance it seemed best to reject the proposal in a diplomatic note and to arrange, if possible, to clinch the matter by General Bradley stating the position to his colleagues on the Standing Group. The State Department might suggest to General Bradley the desirability of such action.

Mr. Daspit handed around an outline of points which he proposed should be made in drawing up the U.S. comments on the British memorandum. It was agreed that these points, modified to take account of the discussion of the Planning Group and the Middle East Defense Council, were appropriate for inclusion in the proposed comments.

UNITED STATES COMMENTS ON THE UNITED KINGDOM MEMORANDUM ON THE MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE ORGANIZATION

The Government of the United States has studied the proposals for the establishment of a Middle East Defense Organization set forth in the United Kingdom memorandum handed to the Department of State August 11, 1952 and desires to make the following comments.

1. Subject to the considerations set forth below, the United States Government is prepared to participate in a Middle East Defense Organization and considers the United Kingdom proposals a satisfactory basis for the establishment of such an organization. In agreeing to participate in an organization of the general character described in the United Kingdom memorandum, the United States Government would be prepared to designate a representative to the

The source text was attached to a memorandum from Byroade to Matthews, dated Sept. 5, not printed. The memorandum informed Matthews that the paper reflected agreement reached with the Department of Defense, and an advance copy of the paper had been given to them on Sept. 4. Unless Defense registered an objection, the paper was to be handed to the British that afternoon. The source text bears the notation "O.K. H. F[reeman] M[atthews]." (780.5/9-552)

Telegram 1645 to London, Sept. 6, transmitted this paper to the Embassy in the United Kingdom. Telegram 1646 on the same day informed the Embassy that a Department of State officer made the following points when he handed the paper to a representative of the British Embassy: The United States "1. wld postpone circulation to other sponsors until middle next week in order give Brits time comment if they desired. 2. Re suggested procedure para 7, Dept thought that fol receipt comments of all sponsors on UK memo shld be possible prepare paper indicating general area agreement—a sort of lowest common denominator showing only essential outlines of proposed org. This paper wld not necessarily be shown Arabs but wld serve as briefing paper for reps who wld discuss MEDO with them. Such generalized position preferable for type tentative conversations Dept favors. Dept hoped that Brits wld undertake prepare such paper." (780.5/9-652) This paper was also transmitted on Sept. 16 in telegram 1555 to Paris, 372 to Ankara, 40 to Pretoria, 45 to Wellington, 50 to Canberra, 218 to Amman, 591 to Cairo, 167 to Damascus, 312 to Baghdad, 518 to Beirut, and 143 to Jidda. Military Representatives Committee, to assign officers to the Planning Group, and to supply some arms and training assistance to certain of the States of the Middle East area in furtherance of the objectives of the organization. During the initial phase of the organization with which the United Kingdom memorandum is concerned, the Government of the United States does not contemplate any further contributions beyond those listed above, and its agreement to participate in the proposed organization does not imply any commitment to supply forces to the area for its defense.

2. In the view of the United States Government, the building of an effective defense of the Middle East involves a political as well as a military problem. In the absence of the political cooperation of the Arab States, the solution of the purely military problem will be immeasurably more difficult. In a sense, therefore, the political problem is anterior and the United States Government considers that the proposals of the United Kingdom shcuId be judged in large measure by the effectiveness with which they may be expectd to contribute to its solution.

3. With the exceptions noted in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, the Government of the United States agrees to the United Kingdom proposals relating to the form and character of the organization. This Government would, however, be prepared to consider modifications in the structure of the organization which might increase its appeal to the Arab States.

4. Subparagraph 4(d) of the United Kingdom memorandum lists among the functions of the Middle East Defense Organization, "To make plans for the operations in war of all forces within, or to be introduced into, the area. . ." [3] In the opinion of the United States Government, this language should be so amended as to make it clear that this function does not include the drawing of plans for the operations in war of forces which may be introduced into the area but which are not specifically allocated for the defense of the area.

5. Paragraph 6 of the United Kingdom memorandum states that the Military Representatives Committee would be "responsible for the general direction of the Planning Group." Paragraph 8 of the memorandum, however, states that "members of the Military Representatives Committee and of the Planning Group would obtain direction and guidance from their respective governments." The Government of the United States considers that it should be clearly specified that the Planning Group would receive military guidance from the Military Representatives Committee, the members of which would in turn receive guidance from their respective governments.

6. The Government of the United States is in complete agreement with the judgment expressed in paragraph 12 of the United Kingdom memorandum that it would be desirable to have the Arab States as participants in the organization during the initial stage of its existance. The Government of the United States does not, however, consider that the proposals in paragraphs 13 and 14 and in the concluding paragraph of the memorandum are the most effective means possible for accomplishing this end. In the judgment of the Government of the United States, it is essential that the Arabs should be made to feel they are being treated as equals, and that their opinions as to the form and character of the organization carry weight with the sponsoring powers. This Government considers it particularly important to avoid giving the Arab States the impression they are being presented with a fait accompli.

7. Taking account of these considerations, the Government of the United States is of the opinion that the Arab States should be consulted concerning MEDO at the earliest practicable time, and that the sponsoring powers should evince a willingness to meet any legitimate points they have to make with respect to the form and character of the proposed organization. In the opinion of this Government it should be possible to consult the Arab States as soon as the area of agreement among the sponsoring powers has been revealed by their initial statements of position on the United Kingdom proposals. This Government would not favor the convening of any meeting of the sponsoring powers to discuss MEDO prior to such consultation. [4]

8. It is the view of this Government that the approach to the Arab States should be informal and that the proposed organization should be described to them in general and tentative terms. No formal invitation of any sort should be extended to the Arab States but they should be given to understand that the plans for the organization contemplate their participation, that the structure as tentatively planned is not finally fixed, and that their comments and suggestions would be welcome. At no stage of these preliminary talks should the Arab States be required to take a firm position as to their willingness to participate. The procedures to be followed in these discussions would vary from one state to another. In some cases the approach might be made by the four original sponsoring powers acting in concert; in others, one power might take the initiative, with the other powers taking supporting roles.

[4] Telegram 1909 to London, Sept. 16, not printed, informed the Embassy that the only change requested by the British was the deletion of the last sentence in paragraph 7. Since comments from the sponsoring powers indicated some divergence of views among them, the British considered an unofficial and informal meeting of the London representatives of the sponsors the best way to collate the comments. The Department of State disagreed on this point, but suggested amending paragraph 7 to read as follows: "Taking account these considerations, US Govt of opinion that Arab States shld be consulted concerning MEDO at earliest practicable time, and sponsoring powers shld evince willingness meet any legitimate points they have to make with respect to form and character proposed org. This govt assumes that the area of agreement revealed by the current exchange of views will be sufficient to permit prelim discussions with the Arab States. If this assumption is correct, this govt wld favor the prompt initiation of such prelim discussions prior to any mtg of the sponsoring powers." (780.5/9-1652)

9. It is the view of this Government that a decision as to the further steps to be taken in the establishment of the Middle East Defense Organization should be postponed until it becomes possible to assess the reaction of the Arab States to these approaches. The Government of the United States is convinced that plans for the defense of the Near East must proceed regardless of the attitude of the Arab States. This attitude, however, may affect both the form of the planning arrangements and the procedure whereby these arrangements are put into effect. The Government of the United States suggests that the Governments of the several sponsoring powers should exchange views as to further steps to be taken as soon as reports on the consultations with the Arab States are in hand.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 19, 1952.

Subject: Mr. Ohly's Memorandum of September 15—MEDO and United States Armed Policy in the Middle East [2]

In the Department's telegram to London dated September 6, 1952, number 1645, [3] the statement "supply some arms and training assistance" to certain of the Middle East states in furtherance of the MEDO objectives was based directly on an official statement of position prepared with the approval of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense as a briefing document for the President in his discussions with Mr. Churchill earlier this year. [4] This statement included the following passage: "U.S. participation will be limited to participation in the integrated command staff and to the provision of some military aid".

In stating the U.S. position on the UK proposals for MEDO, the Department of State and the Department of Defense felt it necessary to make it clear that U.S. participation in the proposed organization did not imply a commitment to provide forces to the Middle East for its defense. This negative statement, unbalanced by any positive indication of the contribution the U.S. is prepared to make, would have had most unfortunate effects. The Department of State feels that if launched under the proper auspices, the MEDO may make an important contribution to the furtherance of the Western interests in the Middle East, but that without strong evidence of U.S. interest in the organization, the prospects of accomplishments of any significance are poor. In view of our inability to provide forces for the organization, the most important contribution we can make will be in the form of military aid. Although the language of the telegram quoted above might be construed as describing nothing more than the reimbursable aid program now under way, we felt that to have stated merely that the U.S. is prepared to sell some arms to the Middle East would hardly have accomplished the described purpose. The language used was in fact intended to suggest the possibility of grant military aid, which we believe was also the intent of the position paper prepared for the President.

The eventuality of the U.S. providing such grant military aid to the Near East has, of course, been foreseen in Mutual Security Legislation of the past two years, which has authorized the President, under certain conditions, to transfer up to 10% of the appropriations for military aid to Greece, Turkey and Iran to other Near East States.

As you are aware, the Department of State and the Department of Defense have been of the opinion that the time has not been propitious for the exercise of this authority. However, the Department of State has become increasingly convinced that more positive actions on the part of the United States are required in the Middle East. This requirement is acknowledged in NSC 129/1, [5] which states that the "US should be prepared to play a larger role in safeguarding Western interests in the area . . . by providing appropriate economic, technical and military assistance".[6] The study of the allocation of U.S. resources now under way should give clearer indication of the amounts of assistance the U.S. can provide for the Near East area in implementation of this policy. In addition, the Department of State is now preparing for NSC consideration a further development of the position stated in 129/1. Moreover, as you know, the Department of State has requested the Department of Defense to undertake a study of the problems involved in a forward defense of the area with particular reference to the forces, equipment and facilities required. The results of this study, we understand, may be available by the end of the month.

[4] The document referred to is the Negotiating Paper Prepared in the Department of State, TCT D-4/2d, Document 55. The section of the paper under reference here reads: "Our participation does not involve the commitment of troops. United States participation will be limited to participation in the integrated command staff and to the provision of some military aid."

[5] Document 71.

We feel that the studies listed above may provide a solid basis for the work of developing military aid programs for some of the Middle East States and possibly for an Executive Branch request for additional legislative authority. In the meantime, as was agreed with you in our meeting of September 15, representatives of the Department of State are exploring with officers of the Department of Defense the preliminary steps which can now be undertaken in planning for such programs and what can now be done to provide against the eventuality that the several studies mentioned above will indicate the desirability of including additional provision for the Near East States in Mutual Security Legislation for 1954.

We will, of course, keep you currently informed of developments in this matter and will furnish you with additional data as these become available.

Editorial Note

The French Ambassador came to the Department of State on July 24 to inform Byroade that the French felt strongly that the Middle East Defense Organization must have a formalized type of central direction which should come from the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Standing Group. Byroade answered that the Arabs would probably have much less interest in the organization if it appeared that the United States, United Kingdom, and France were retaining sole direction. (Memorandum of conversation, July 24; 780.5/7-2452) On August 1, the Counselor of the French Embassy called at the Department of State to inform the Department that the French position on the central direction of the MEDO seemed firm and unlikely to be altered under any conditions. (Memorandum of conversation, August 1; 780.5/8-152)

On August 15, an officer of the French Embassy handed the Department of State a copy of an aide-mémoire presented by the French to the British Government in answer to the British Middle East Defense Organization proposal of August 11, which was the same as the text transmitted in telegram Secto 24, Document 79. (780.5/6-1652) The French aide-mémoire was discussed at a joint meeting of representatives of the Departments of State and Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff on August 26, at which the Department of State was informed that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were fundamentally opposed to having the NATO Steering Group function for the MEDO. (For the minutes of this meeting, see the memorandum of conversation by Daspit, Document 84.)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 22, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Attached is a memorandum [1] setting forth proposed United States comments on certain proposals concerning the Middle East Defense Organization put forward by the French Government in a memorandum handed to the Department of State August 15, 1952 (copy attached). [2] A copy of this memorandum was transmitted informally to the Department of Defense at the time of its receipt. [3]

The French memorandum is addressed principally to the question of the higher military direction of MEDO and emphasizes the importance the French attach to making the NATO Standing Group responsible for the guidance and direction of MEDO. In view of the interest of the Department of Defense in this matter, I would appreciate your advising me as to whether you consider the proposed memorandum to the French an appropriate expression of United States views.

Editorial Note

The First Secretary of the Italian Embassy called at the Department of State on August 6 and 7 to discuss the plans for a Middle East Command or Defense Organization, and express the concern of the Italian Government that it had not been invited to participate. The Italians were concerned because the original Four Powers who had issued the November 1951 Declaration had invited South Africa, New Zealand, and Australia, but not Italy, to study the subject of Middle East defense. (Memorandum of conversation by Collins, August 11; 780.5/8-1152) A memorandum by Adair to Parsons, dated August 8, stated that while no wording in public announcements on the Middle East Defense Organization precluded Italian membership, lack of direct Italian interests in the Middle East meant that Italy had never been considered a possible participant in the Organization. The memorandum suggested that Italian inclinations to join the Organization should be discouraged. EUR officers attempted to do this on the occasion of calls at the Department by the First Secretary of the Italian Embassy on August 14 and September 22.

A Department of State position on this matter was formulated at the working level in a meeting on September 23 between officers of the Office of Western European Afairs (V. Lancing Collins and Stanley B. Wolff) and incorporated into an informal "Memo to Files" by Wolff on September 23. (780.5/9-2352) It stated that the Italians would be kept informed of future developments concerning the Organization that might be of interest to them. It added that the Political-Military Adviser of the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs was strongly opposed to Italian participation in the Organization at that time, but would not oppose additional Western members, including Italy, once the Arab States had joined.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 1, 1952.

Subject: French Position regarding MEDO.

Participants: General Omar Bradley, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff
Mr. Nitze—S/P
Mr. Nolting—G

Mr. Nitze and I went to see General Bradley in order to enlist his support in dissuading the French from their insistence on holding a US-UK-French meeting to discuss the French proposal that the NATO Standing Group should serve also as the High Military Authority of MEDO. Mr. Nitze pointed out that the French had previously presented us with an Aide-Mémoire urging the Three-Power meeting and we had prepared a reply, opposing the suggestion, which had been forwarded to Defense for concurrence. [2] The British had discussed the matter with the French and we were in receipt of a telegram from London in which the British suggested that such a Three-Power meeting was necessary before the French would proceed to comment on the British proposals for MEDO. [3]

General Bradley agreed that it is unnecessary and undesirable to hold a Three-Power meeting on this subject. He said that the French should be dissuaded from their position that the NATO Standing Group should be expanded into a Three-Power "Combined Chiefs of Staff".

In discussing tactics, Mr. Nitze reverted to a suggestion previously made that Air Marshal Elliot should designate an officer on his staff who would consult with the staff of the JCS on non-NATO matters, especially Middle East defense matters. Mr. Nitze suggested that if we did this, the British would feel that they have a better "in" with us in world planning, and as a result would be less inclined to support the French in the matter concerning MEDO. General Bradley said that Elliot has recently been pressing him on this; that he had taken it up with the Chiefs, who took a dim view of it; and that he was unwilling to go along with Elliot's suggestion, inasmuch as he could see no practical result from staff conversations at the level proposed. As an alternative, he suggested that he might have more frequent conversations with Air Marshal Elliot (he said that he already had discussions with him quite frequently on global matters), and that if Elliot wished he would be willing to make the meetings more formal, with an agenda, etc. He made it clear, however, that these would be discussion meetings for the purpose of exchanging views, rather than meetings for the purpose of making decisions. We agreed that an answer to Elliot along the lines suggested by General Bradley would fit nicely into our tactic of preventing British support for the French position re MEDO. It was left somewhat vague, however, as to whether General Bradley would in fact make such a proposal to Air Marshal Elliot.

[1] A copy of this memorandum was forwarded to the Secretary of State.

[2] See the letter from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense, Document 88.

[3] Presumably, this reference is to telegram 1791 from London, Sept. 26, not printed. The Embassy reported the British Foreign Office had expressed a strong hope that the Department of State could arrange for an informal tripartite discussion of the French Aide-Mémoire of Aug. 15 by the military representatives of the three powers in Washington. (780.5/9-2650)

General Bradley did agree to speak both to Elliot and to General Ely in an effort to dissuade them from insisting upon a Three-Power meeting concerning MEDO, using the arguments listed in our draft Aide-Mémoire to the French, a copy of which I left with him.

General Bradley then raised the question of Iran, and stated that he and the Chiefs were greatly worried by the deteriorating situation there. Mr. Nitze brought him up-to-date on our thinking and actions, and told him of our recommendation to the President which would have the effect of breaking away from the joint UK-US communications to Mosadeq. General Bradley said he agreed with this, and said that he felt it preferable for us not to be "in the same boat" with the British on this matter, even if we ourselves have little hope of finding a formula which will prevent further deterioration in Iran. In a full discussion of this matter, Mr. Nitze emphasized the serious nature of any decision which would break the solidarity of the British and ourselves in our approach to the Iranian problem. He said that it might well have its effect in UK-US cooperation in other areas; that we had very carefully considered this danger but had reached the conclusion that we must attempt, by using our own best judgment, to prevent the eventual fall of Iran into the Communist orbit. General Bradley expressed agreement with this view.

In discussing in general terms the strategic problem in the Middle East, General Bradley said that the JCS think in terms of an "inner circle", which would include the Suez bases and the surrounding areas necessary for their defense, and an "outer circle" which would include Iran. With the accession of Turkey to NATO, and the long range possibilities of MEDO, the "outer circle" concept became more feasible militarily, provided Iran does not go Communist. He considered that the Turkish army, plus US and UK air power working on the flank of any invading force approaching the Middle East through Iran, could greatly impede, if not prevent, the conquest of the Middle East. If, however, the flank of an invading force were made less vulnerable by an Iran allied with Russia, the defense task would become immeasurably more difficult.

General Bradley raised the subject of the pending anti-trust suits against certain American oil companies,[4] and expressed the strong view that these suits were gravely jeopardizing our supply of strategic oil. He said that it was his impression that not only in the Middle East, but also in other countries where American oil interests operate, it was likely that the countries would adopt the attitude that they would not do business with companies which were under indictment by their own government. I did not gather that he had any specific or immediate cause for alarm in this respect, but that he was predicting a trend which would in his view undoubtedly arise from these suits. We reviewed what we had done in this matter, and what our attitude had been from the first, but no conclusions were reached as to how to ameliorate the ill effects in foreign and defense policy of this anti-trust action.

The Greek Ambassador called at the Department of State on August 11 to tell the Under Secretary of State that the Greek Government was very interested in becoming a member of the Middle East Planning Group. He was told there seemed to be many complex problems incident to Greek participation which should first be resolved, but that the Department would give him a reply as soon as possible. (Memorandum of conversation by Dixon, August 11; 780.5/8–1152) The Greek Ambassador called again on August 18 to restate the official interest of the Greek Government in participation in the planning of a Middle East Defense Organization. He stated that Greece was not prepared at that time to contribute any forces to the proposed Organization, but could help with advice and " 'with our islands—Cyprus and the Dodecanese.' " The Government of Greece had not presented its views to any other sponsoring power except the United States, and it was agreed the Department of State position would be formulated and discussed with the Ambassador before any further steps were taken by either government. (Memorandum of conversation by Baxter, August 18; 780.5/8–1852)

Telegram 348 to Ankara, September 12, repeated to Athens, Paris, and Rome, informed those Embassies the Department of State had not yet formulated its views on the Greek request, but thought the Greeks should be discouraged on the basis that Greece had heavy responsibilities in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and Greek interests in the Middle East could be safeguarded by the contemplated close liaison between MEDO and NATO. On September 19, the Greek Ambassador again called at the Department of State to bring officially to the Department's attention the fact that Greece had made a formal request to each of the sponsoring powers for inclusion in the Organization. 2434. Dept has recd Grk aide-mémoire thru Am Emb Athens [2] similar those delivered other sponsoring powers requesting Grk participation seven-power discussions re org ME defense. Grk Amb in discussing question with Dept made clear that Grks wish become MEDO sponsor.

Dept recognizes that (1) Greece not located in ME and thus unable supply bases or facilities for ME defense, (2) Greece cannot be expected make significant contribution of troops or equipment to ME defense. Grk Amb has stated to Dept Greece has important influence with Arab States, which if true wld be possible compensating factor but little evidence this in fact case. On above basis Dept does not consider Greece shld become member MEDO. If, in spite these considerations, Greece admitted MEDO, wld be difficult exclude certain other states peripheral to ME with similar or even slighter justification for membership. Moreover because of possible important role of Cyprus in MEDO, Grk admission might create difficulties this connection.

Mr. Matthews: I have been on leave for several weeks and am not familiar with the details of the aspects of the MEDO problem scheduled for discussion.

[2] The meeting was held at 11 a.m. in the Pentagon.

General Bradley: Should we begin by discussing the MEDO question? Perhaps Paul Nitze could lay out the situation.

Mr. Nitze: Last week we came over and talked with General Bradley. We were concerned that in a situation in which there may be some possibility of making progress with the Egyptians, we should be ready and able to move forward with MEDO if an opportunity should occur. At present the block to progress on MEDO is the French refusal to circulate their comments on the paper which the UK has produced. [3] The French say that they want first to have a three-power meeting, the chief subject of which would be discussing the role of the standing group in MEDO coordination. The French want the standing group to also take on the running of MEDO. We have thought that it would not be helpful to have a three-power meeting. We do, however, need to reply to the French aide mémoire. [4] We thought that possibly General Bradley might be able to help by discussing the question with General Ely and this might possibly soften up the French position. We also were concerned that we should do what we could to avoid the British and the French ganging up on us on this question, and we thought that possibly one thing that might influence this was to get the British to feel happier about their relationsip with us. During the Slessor talks,[5] the British made a suggestion that there might be a more formal setup for guiding the ground strategy of the cold war. I suggested to General Bradley that it might make the British feel better and thus help to avoid a British-French joint position on the standing group question if Elliot's staff had some special man on it who could talk with the JCS on matters other than NATO, and particularly perhaps Middle Eastern questions.

General Bradley: I haven't talked with Ely yet and also I haven't discussed this general question with the Chiefs. I do have one worry about talking with Ely. Ely stands very well with the French Government and also he is very useful to us. His general attitude has been cooperative and I can't think of anybody that it would be easier for us to work with. You might say that this would be a good reason for talking with him about the question of the three-power conference but on the other hand if he should be persuaded by our views, wouldn't there be the possibility that he might hurt his own position with the French Government if he argued for the US case.

Mr. Matthews: He wouldn't have to agree with our views or argue our case with his government. You could just tell him what your thinking was and he could pass it along just as a matter of information.

[3] The British paper under reference here is the one transmitted in telegram Secto 24, Document 79.

[4] See Document 87.

[5] Regarding the talks held when Air Marshal Lord Slessor was in the United States in January 1951, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. IV, pp. 914 ff.

[Here follows discussion dealing with a press conference Secretary Acheson was having that day.]

General Collins: On the MEDO question, have we had any further ideas as to how planning for MEDO can be tied in with planning for NATO?

General Bradley: Our thought all along has been that we have been opposed to setting up a standing group in peace time primarily because of its effect on the other obligations we have which are not European. We have this ANZUS thing and we have our Inter-American Alliance and we would have real difficulties if we had a peacetime standing group with the British and the French. There might be overriding political considerations which would make it necessary to have a standing group in peace time, but from the military point of view we don't like it. However, even if we did set up a standing group for MEDO, we think it would be bad to have it composed of the UK, France, and ourselves with the exclusion of the Turks and the Arabs. They would get the idea the three powers were making all the arrangements and that they had no say on what was going to happen. Another possibility is that we might set up a small group here in Washington to discuss Middle Eastern and Far Eastern questions with the British and the French. That presents the difficulty that is a step in the direction of the combined Chiefs of Staff, which we take a very dim view of. . . .

Mr. Matthews: The French objective is fairly clear. They are obviously trying to work toward the establishment of a world-wide combined Chiefs of Staff on which they would have membership. And this, we agree, would not be helpful.

Mr. Stabler: The difficulty is that as of now we are stymied. Our plan was to coordinate our views with the French and the Turks and the British as to what we should discuss with the Arabs when we issue the invitation to them. The French by refusing to comment on the UK paper are making it impossible for us to present the Arabs coordinated views. We thought it would be most helpful if we could get an expression from the military point of view that a 3-power conference to discuss the relationship of the standing group with MEDO would not be useful.

General Collins: Should we tell the French that we are going to go ahead with discussions with the Arabs anyway?

Mr. Byroade: The difficulty is the French are holding out for this 3-power meeting. The first thing to do is to tell the French that there is not going to be any such meeting.

General Vandenberg: Why can't we just tell them that we are going to make the approach to the Arabs anyway and we hope they will see fit to make such comments as they have on the UK plan before we actually make the approach, but that we are going to go ahead anyway.

General Collins: It is not clear to me how much we are in accord with the British and the Turks in what we want to say to the Arabs.

General Bradley: There are some points of difference between the UK and ourselves. . . . In general, however, I think we are, on practically all important points, fairly close to the British.

Mr. Stabler: The Turks, by and large, go along with our position.

Mr. Nitze: The real problem is whether we are ready to say that we will approach the Arabs without having secured French comments.

Mr. Byroade: I think there is a real question as to whether the British would go along with us in talking to the Arabs without having first secured French agreement.

Mr. Nitze: I agree that there is a real question. Basically we have two alternatives. We can have the 3-power meeting or we can propose to proceed without the French in getting MEDO started. In making the decision we should take into consideration the tactics which the USSR now seems to be employing. They seem to be preparing a major effort to isolate the US from its Allies, while at the same time they continue the kind of direct pressure on the US that may be indicated by recent offensives in Korea—the buzzing of 47's in the corridor and the attack of B–29's over Hokaido. We are already in difficulties with the British over Egypt and Iran and we are also in difficulties with the French over the Tunisian question in the UN. I think we have to think very carefully about how we are going to conduct ourselves in leading our coalition so that there will not be danger that the Russians will succeed in isolating us from our Allies.

General Bradley: This is why I said that there might be overriding political reasons for having a standing group in peace time.

Mr. Matthews: I don't think that we feel that that is called for as yet.

Mr. Nitze: We do, however, have to give real thought to the question of how we can conduct ourselves so that our Allies will feel that they are really part of an alliance and not feel that they are kept on the outside in matters which concern them very directly.

Mr. Byroade: It seems to me that what we need is an expression by our military that from the military point of view there is no reason to have the 3-power meeting to discuss the role of the standing group.

General Bradley: I can tell Ely informally what my views are without asking him either to agree to them or to pass them on to his government. He obviously would report our views to his government anyway. But this leaves the question of what approach we should take towards the British. I have thought that what I might tell Elliot is that he is perfectly free to talk informally with me at any time on anything which is of concern to him or the British. And I could also tell him that he should feel perfectly free to talk with any of the Chiefs on the same basis.

General Collins: How about having Elliot's staff talk with staff officers over here.

General Bradley: That actually was Nitze's suggestion and an arrangement which we were trying to avoid.

Mr. Matthews: Oliver Franks[6] says that in the political field his officers can go around and talk to people at lower levels in the State Department and find out, without any commitments on either side, what the general thinking of our people is on various questions. On the military side, however, he says there isn't any such possibility of informal discussions at anything other than the very highest level.

General Vandenberg: It seems to me that we would get into a lot of trouble if the British start talking with subordinate officers over here. They are apt to take the views of the subordinates as being the official position of the US Government.

Mr. Nitze: Admittedly, there are some dangers just as there are when our subordinate officers talk with representatives of foreign countries. But when you are running a coalition you do have to pay attention to your Allies. It seems to me that our position of strength and our leadership of the coalition is firm enough so that in general the benefits which we would gain from discussing matters more fully and openly with our Allies would outweigh the dangers which such discussions might raise.

General Collins: I don't really see how we can expect to get anywhere without having talks between our staffs at the staff level. We need the information as to what the British position and the British thinking is apt to be, and they need the same thing from us. I think someone on Elliot's staff could talk usefully and informally, say, to General Eddleman for the Army and the equivalent officers in Navy and Air. I don't think, though, that we should go below our Operations Deputies.

General Vandenberg: If that is the case, I don't see why we might not just as well set up a regular combined Chiefs of Staff. The arguments that we have always had against that were just that we wanted to avoid the kind of staff talks which it seems to me you are really talking about.

[6] British Ambassador in the United States.

General Collins: I would be against setting up a formal combined staff. The Russians could make such good propaganda out of that by saying that we were fully engaged in planning for war and it probably would worry our other Allies.

General Bradley: Could we leave it this way. Why don't I say to Elliott that he is free to come and talk to me at any time, that he is free to come and talk with any one of the Chiefs at any time and that if he has a special officer on non-NATO matters, that officer would be free to talk to the operations officer of anyone of the three services.

Admiral Fechteler: I have no objection, but I don't know what real use it would be.

Mr. Matthews: It might at least educate the British to realize that we really don't keep things from them.

"The Secretary presents his compliments His Excellency Amb Fr and refers to his Note No. 461 Aug 15 transmitting text aide-mémoire of Fr Govt to Brit Emb in Paris in reply UK memo Aug 7 with respect proposals estab MEDO.

USG studied with care aide-mémoire of Fr Govt on UK proposals. Although aide-mémoire presented Dept for info, it concluded with suggestion certain pts shld be made subj exchange of views through dipl channels among USG, Fr and UK. Subsequently, Fr FonOff proposed to US Emb in Paris these pts shld be considered at mtg in Lon of reps three Govts.[3]

[1] Also sent to London priority as 2666.

[2] This text is substantially the same as the draft transmitted to the Department of Defense under cover of the Secretary of State's letter (signed by Byroade) of Sept. 22, Document 88.

The Department of Defense response was made in a letter of Oct. 13 from Deputy Under Secretary of Defense Foster to the Secretary of State, under which was transmitted a Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum of Oct. 6, neither printed. (780.5/10-1352)

Two substantive revisions were recommended by the Joint Chiefs in their Oct. 6 memorandum, which were concurred in by the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense in his letter of Oct. 13 with the request that the JCS views be incorporated into the reply to the French aide-mémoire. These revisions are noted in footnotes below.

USG wishes explain to Fr Govt reasons why it does not favor three-power mtg subj MEDO and considers it might be appropriate same time to indicate its position several important pts developed in aide-mémoire Aug 15.

This Govt appreciates considerations which have moved Fr Govt propose that pts involving NATO Standing Grp and NE Arms Coord Comite shld be discussed initially on three-power basis. Difficulty holding such mtg in secret has, however, been demonstrated by experience. In opinion this Govt, reactions other sponsoring powers and Arab States as well, in event they learned such a mtg had occurred, wld be extremely adverse. It wld probably be felt three powers were assuming right determine important issues gen concern in advance consultation other interested states. USG considers it wld be unwise to take steps which wld thus risk impairing principles coop and equality membership on which it is agreed proposed org shld be based.

The USG shares conviction Fr Govt that close liaison must be maintained between proposed MEDO and NATO. This Govt, however, does not consider such liaison shld be effected by means of identical Standing Grp functioning in both orgs. It is true this solution was proposed in Standing Grp study 'Command in the Mediterranean and ME' (S.G. 80/4)[4] but as Fr Govt is aware, this paper was presented merely as preliminary study. Moreover, necessity for modifying proposals put forward therein was recognized in North Atlantic Milit Comite Nov 20, 1951, (M.C. 38).[5]

As Fr Govt aware, some of member Govts NATO wld be most reluctant agree at present time formal association NATO with MEDO through device common Standing Grp. This arrangement, which wld tend emphasize Western character MEDO, wld also obviously have undesirable effects Arab States, whose participation org it must be prime object policy to effect. Moreover, in view this Govt, it wld be unwise estab in MEDO Steering Grp from which Turkey excluded. Obvious Turkey's contribution ME defense will be greatest importance and this Govt feels strongly no action shld be taken which might diminish willingness Turk Govt to make this contribution full and effective.

[5] Not found in Department of State files. Entitled "Progress on Command Arrangements for Mediterranean and Middle East," this paper was considered at the Eighth Session of the North Atlantic Council, which met in Rome, Nov. 24–28, 1951. For documentation, see ibid., pp. 693 ff.

Coord of work and plans MEDO with those of NATO, concerning necessity which USG in full agreement with Fr Govt, cld, in view this Govt be effectively served by estab for MEDO some form ad hoc arrangement on milit level,[6] outside formal org, whereby views US, Fr, UK and Turkey might be coord on continuing basis prior being brought to bear on operations Planning Grp.

It is view this Govt such ad hoc arrangement cld satisfactorily provide coord of work MEDO with that of NATO, and such continuing milit guidance as MEDO Planning Grp may require during initial phase MEDO with which Brit memo concerned. In fact, this Govt believes there wld be particular merit in such arrangement, which wld make possible organic growth MEDO in response demands of developing experience. As org develops and moves closer to stage where it is ready to assume actual Command responsibilities, modifications in structure, including estab some formal Steering Grp, will no doubt be required. It will probably also be necessary to provide some more formal means for maintaining liaison with NATO. It is view this Govt that it will be possible more clearly judge form such arrangements should assume when time arrives and meantime liaison with NATO and guidance to MEDO Planning Grp shld be provided on informal basis suggested.

USG has also given careful consideration question source of direction and guidance to proposed Planning Grp and agrees with view of Govt Fr that it wld be logical and desirable for Planning Grp to work under authority and supervision Milit Reps Comite. It is view USG that latter comite alone shld receive its instructions from Govts concerned.[7]

With respect function of coord requests of States of ME for arms and equipment, USG in agreement with position of Fr Govt that for time being no change shld be made in present procedures under which this task is performed by three-power comite sitting in Wash. However, it is clear this is field in which MEDO will have substantial interest and three powers will have to decide later, on basis experience, how operations NE Arms Coordinating Comite can best be coordinated with defense plans of MEDO. This Govt does not consider use of language of para 4C of UK memo will embarrass work of NE Arms Coordinating Comite or increase difficulty effecting coord of this work with plans MEDO.

The Acting Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Missions in the Near East [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, October 17, 1952—8:26 p. m.

449. Part I of II. Brit Emb informed Dept [2] that UK now prepared join other sponsors in early approach to Arab States on MEDO. Fon Off sounds note of warning that care must be taken to prevent prelim exchange of views with Arabs from developing into interminable and fruitless negotiations and emphasizes need to show in near future real evidence of determination and ability to resist aggression in ME.

A.1. Fon Off considers necessary present Arabs with written text in order to avoid subsequent misunderstanding. Proposes that each Arab Govt be told that similar communications being made to others, that Govt's written or oral comments wld be welcome and that if Govt chose to designate rep to pursue discussions with sponsoring powers, this acceptable. Also proposes, inform Govts that no commitments had been made regarding Israeli participation and Israeli Govt not being invited to comment at this stage.

2. Fon Off opposes multilateral démarche and suggests communications shld be made in each capital by one rep of sponsors, other reps taking subsequently appropriate supporting action. Suggests rep who wld act in each capital wld be local doyen among sponsors reps.

[2] A memorandum of conversation, dated Oct. 13, not printed, recorded the visit of an officer of the British Embassy to the Department of State to present the views of the British Foreign Office on approaching the Arab States concerning the Middle East Defense Organization. He read a message from Eden to the British Ambassador and left the text of the proposed communication to the Arab States which is transmitted in this telegram. (780.5/10-1352)

3. Approach to Egypt to be accompanied by Brit attempt to work out settlement of Suez problem.

B. Abbreviated text proposed communication to Arabs follows:

"1. Pres lack of effective coord plans for defence of ME must be cause of concern to states in area and entire free world. ME area constituting as it does point of junction between three continents lies in vital and vulnerable strategic position and evident it can no longer afford remain in contrast with other regions vacuum from point view defence planning. Successful arrangements ensure its security must depend on concerted efforts of all interested states. Can be no doubt that effective central org embracing all those countries both within and outside area which are able and willing help in its defence is only means of coord these efforts and achieving joint aims of powers concerned.

"2. The . . . Govt will recall that guiding principles of such org were set out in Paris declaration of Nov 10th 1951.[3] Particular stress was laid on its purely defensive character. Also made clear that such org wld not prejudice independence of states in area which it was hoped wld participate in it as equal members.

"3. Govts of UK, US, Fr, Turk, Aust, NZ and South Africa have since been carefully considering what steps shld be taken to give effect to purposes set forth in this declaration and they now wish to give . . . Govt indication of lines on which their ideas crystalizing. As result of latest exchanges of views between them seven Govts are agreed that best method procedure wld be to estab in first place an org whose activities wld be limited to planning coord and liaison. This org wld provide desired centre for coord defence efforts of interested states. Task wld be draw up common plans for defending ME for remedying existing milit deficiencies and for providing milit assistance in shape of arms equipment training or advice. Org wld be estab in most suitable available place ME. UK have offered Cyprus; other sites suggested; decision on point might be taken by all powers who participate in proposed joint org. Details of structure of org have not been worked out though certain principles wld clearly have be observed. Must be body on which all participating states wld be represented and planning group of staff officers. In gen org shld be kept small and flexible so that it may operate efficiently and undertake further responsibilities as time goes on.

"4. At this stage while various possibilities are under discussion between them it wld be most valuable to seven Govts to know prelim and gen reactions of Govts to above proposals. They wld accordingly welcome any comments which wld help them take decisions on nature, composition, scope, structure and seat of org."

The Acting Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Missions in the Near East [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, October 17, 1952—8:26 p. m.

450. Part II of II. Depts tentative views on UK proposals follow:

I. Numbering corresponds to that in Part I this message.

A.1. Dept agrees probably desirable present Arabs written statement. Arab States will certainly discuss proposal among themselves and desirable for them have solid basis for purpose.

Procedure suggested for providing Arab reaction seems appropriate. Leaves to them decision whether they wish continue discussion and does not imply inaction their part will constitute veto. Further consideration necessary as to just how possible discussions with Arab reps might best be handled. If several states favorably disposed, might possibly be desirable invite them to mtg with sponsors.

2. Agree multilateral démarche awkward but not certain re practical effect principle proposed. Missions comments this point particularly requested.

3. Re approach to Egypt, Dept inclined feel wld be desirable make separate and very informal approach prior to gen round with other Arab States. Realize risk this may cause injured feelings other Arab States, but desirability doing everything possible enlist Egyptian support obvious. Moreover, prior overture Egypt justifiable on ground Egypt originally invited become sponsor. Dept agrees Emb Cairo approach best made after Brit have offered some conciliatory gesture, feels perhaps agreement release jet planes wld serve. Not thought Egypt wld wish become sponsor nor that discussions wld proceed far without involving whole problem of Suez settlement. Nevertheless, appears there might be significant advantages in according Egypt priority suggested. Approaches other Arab States shld be made simultaneously some time after initial approaches to Egypt.

B. Re text of proposed communication, Dept feels that in gen even for limited purpose indicated, statement too sketchy and not calculated make maximum possible appeal to Arabs. Re numbered paras:

1. No comment.

[1] Sent to Amman, Baghdad, Beirut, Cairo, Damascus, Jidda, and Ankara, and repeated for information to London, Paris, Tel Aviv, Wellington, Canberra, and Pretoria. Drafted by Daspit and cleared by NE, GTI, BNA, and S/S.

2. Ref to Paris Declaration shld be expanded to include certain of principles calculated appeal Arabs, particularly ref to objective increasing indigenous capacities for defense permitting reduction in role of non-ME States (para 10).

3. This para shld be broken up into five parts:

a. Emphasize prelim nature of 7-power discussions and eliminate suggestion that ideas on point of crystallization.

b. Point out essential principles of Nov Declaration maintained but command concept not element in revised proposals. Underline fact that no formal commitment will be required for participation in proposed org.

c. Outline principal functions of org.: Coop study of requirements for area defense, coord of efforts of participating states to meet these requirements; remedying existing milit deficiencies; providing milit assistance in shape of arms equipment, training or advice.

d. Statement as to site seems appropriate in present form.

e. Perhaps fuller description of structure of org as developed in 7-power exchange, but stated as example of possible solution rather than as firm proposal.

4. This para shld be redrafted to suggest Arabs may participate in formulation of decisions rather than merely offer observations for possible consideration.

Missions' comments on UK proposals and Dept's tentative views as outlined above urgently requested. [2] In addition, wld appreciate Missions' comments on desirability either in note or in course verbal presentation making some ref Arab Security Pact as suggested para II B Cairo's 473 Aug 26 to Dept rpt unnum Ankara and Arab caps. [3]

II.A. No fixed schedule for approach Arabs and some time may elapse before this possible. Views Aust, NZ on UK memo not yet received though UK expects shortly and anticipates no difficulty. FR being very insistent re use NATO Standing Grp in MEDO and may delay completion exchange by intransigence this point. Once exchange completed Dept considers approach Egypt shld be made earliest favorable occasion with approach other Arab States keyed to this.

[2] Telegram 300 from Amman, Oct. 21, not printed, agreed with most of the Department of State views, except the suggestion in paragraph A3 that it might be desirable to approach Egypt before the other Arab States. The Embassy in Amman was strongly inclined to favor simultaneous presentation to all the Arab States, saying it was "many disadvantages and no compensatory advantages in prelim presentation to Egypt." (780.5/10-2152)

Telegram 305 from Damascus, Oct. 23, reported that the Embassy favored an early informal approach to Egypt and it disagreed with paragraph B3 (e), saying "suggest there be no initial description structure org which of secondary importance Arabs." (780.5/10-2352) Additional replies are in Department of State file 780.5.

[3] Not printed, but see footnote 6, Document 98.

B. Dept continues hold that decision re proceeding with formal establishment MEDO must depend on assessment Arab reactions to initial approaches. US convinced that plans for ME defense must be developed in any event. However, Dept feels this might better be accomplished by inconspicuous and unpublicized arrangements in event Arabs demonstrate gen and strong hostility to MEDO proposals.

SECRET LONDON, October 20, 1952—9 p.m.

2304. Re Embtel 2280, October 19. [2] FonOff today took initiative in informing us tht convs with Turk Prime and FonMins re MEDO had been most satis. Within next few days, FonOff will be informing Dept more formally re convs thru Brit Emb Wash and Turks thru US Emb Ankara.[3] Prior doing so, however, FonOff instructing Brit Emb Ankara clear minutes with Turks in order assure no misunderstandings re gen lines of talks as result possible faulty translation. Meanwhile, FonOff wished give us its understanding. FonOff said Menderes had expressed great appreciation for urgent need org ME def and reiterated Turkey's willingness participate. He felt there was urgent need for setting up MEDO. It wld be much better if Arabs wld participate, but sponsors must go ahead and org MEDO even if Arabs will not play.

Brit showed Turks copy of draft contained section B Depcirtel 449 Oct 17 [4] and explained Brit views re consulting Arab states as set forth section A. Menderes indicated that he thought it wld be desirable if all Arab states cld be brought into org, but he did not think this cld be accomplished by simultaneous démarches to all states concerned. He felt some are more interested than others. For example, he had recently talked to Regent here in London and he felt there was good possibility of persuading Iraqis to join org. If Arab bloc cld be split up on this question and one or more Arab states brought in, then others might fol. He thought that it was desirable to sound out Iraqis first and, in view his conv with Regent, suggested Turks undertake do so. If Iraqi agrmt can be obtained, then either Iraq or UK might attempt bring in Jordan. Next step might then be to try bring in Saudi Arabia and Lebanon.

FonOff indicated Menderes felt present moment propitious for splitting Arab states on this question. Arab League not at present effective org and there are increasing indications that monarchial states beginning look askance at republican tendencies in Egypt.

Re Egypt, Menderes thought it wld be best not to raise question MEDO participation at this time, but to let matter rest until progress cld be shown in Anglo-Egyptian prob.

FonOff added that all Brit reps in the field who have been consulted re proposals set forth Brit memo contained Depcirtel 449 have been unanimous in viewpoint that these are wrong tactics to pursue with Arab states.

Emb off recalled that gen tactics which Menderes suggested re approach Arab states were essentially those suggested by Brit some months ago. He recalled that we had felt strongly at time that they were open grave difficulties. He expressed appreciation for info and anticipated Dept might have some observations when Dept formally informed of talks by Brit and Turks.

FonOff also indicated that no points of any importance had been discussed re organizational aspects of MEDO, discussions having been mainly restricted question tactical approach to Arabs.

1007. Before noting specific content Depcirtels 449 and 450,[2] Oct 17, and in full concurrence with Dept's view that Egypt is key to Arab acceptance or rejection MEDO concept I desire submit fol observations re sitn here:

1. Egypt will not participate as partner with Britain in any MEDO concept unless British announce acceptance principle of evacuation Canal Zone and actually begin evacuation troops

(having in mind that final withdrawal troops will be simultaneous with entry of Egypt into eventual defense organizations leaving on base only troops disguised as technicians). This wld not preclude Egypt in meantime entering into discussions on MEDO planning group.

Accordingly, it is essential that assurances be given by British on this point if any Egypt acceptance of MEDO is to be expected. A mere agreement to release jet planes 80 percent paid for by Egypt under legal contract wld not suffice to win Egypt entrance into MEDO planning group.[3]

2. Dept's 450 while taking cognizance of factors set forth above is silent on fact that conversations are currently in progress between US and Egyptian Govts on possible military and economic assistance to Naguib regime. As indicated final para Embtel 886, Oct 8,[4] members of military high comite are increasingly anxious that something tangible [to] be done quickly to convince army that western powers and especially US are friendly to Naguib regime and willing to help it. I anticipate that reply to Dept's message (Deptel 678, Sept 30)[5] will be made by Naguib this week since officers preparing reply have indicated that their lists of equipment necessary to bring Egypt's armed forces up to present planned strength are about ready for submission.

3. In my opinion prompt affirmative action in providing Egyptian army with even token shipment of some equipment wld do more than anything else to bring Naguib govt to point of agreeing at least to consider with us and other sponsoring powers outline of MEDO.

Taking Dept's 450 with enumeration established therein I have fol comments:

I. A. 1. Agree.

2. I likewise feel multilateral approach not desirable and on whole favor British suggestion in para A2 Dept's 449. In this connection recall second para section 2B Embtel 473, Aug. 26,[6] which I now desire amplify by saying that my British colleague indicates his govt aware that UK cannot present proposals here and that it desires me to undertake this task.

3. My overall views this para covered in sections 1 and 2 above. At same time we shld agree to make available to Egyptian army

520. Depcirtels 449 and 450. [2] Emb agrees with Dept's excellent comments on UK draft paper.

No objections here re prelimin informal approach to Egypt. Iraqis in general recognize paramount importance Egypt to successful defense org and any criticisms can be turned aside this basis.

Believe Emb Cairo's suggestion re lifting as much as possible of nomenclature, language and ideas from Arab collective security pact and incorporating them into whatever final MEDO instrument evolves had merit provided it can be done so as not to interfere with MEDO's de facto capacity deal with Arab countries individually. Emb believes, however, that it wld be better omit mention of pact in first instance and let suggestions come from Arabs themselves so that they may feel they have had some kind of creative role in MEDO. Iraqis and others almost sure to bring up Arab collective security pact if they engage in subsequent discussions.

In re manner presentation I agree multilateral démarche too heavy-handed and formalistic for purpose proposed. Local Doyen [3] taking lead wld apparently give Turkey no major role in any country and also may coincidentally give rise "spheres of influence" impression. However, I see no practicable alternative. It is probably true that Regent, [3] with his personal pro-Western inclinations, displayed favorable attitude in discussing MEDO with Turk PriMin in London, but bringing Iraq Govt as whole to make break with other Arab states not only difficult but probably also inadvisable from standpoint Iraqs internal stability. In any case present caretaker Iraq Govt in no position to make decision.

If MEDO made sufficiently attractive Iraqis cld be persuaded use their influence in discussion with other Arab states to bring about collective Arab decision participate in MEDO but in this Emb's view Egypt must also be persuaded before positive Arab action likely.

Anti-Turk sentiment presently so high here that Emb doubts if Turk intervention wld be fruitful. Turk has no Amb here and intervention by Chargé ahead of Brit and US Amb might not only create suspicion concerning Turk motive but also give impression that US and UK were trying to get out-from-under.

SECRET ANKARA, October 24, 1952—9 p. m.

542. Section one of two. Re Deptels circ 449 [2] and 539, [3] Oct 17, and London's 46, Oct 20 [4] to Ankara. FonMin on Oct 23 gave Amb extensive account London meeting including MEDO discussion which are reported this tel. Other subjects being reported separate tels and entire conversation by desp.

1. FonMin said both Turks and Brit reaffirmed agreement organize ME defense as soon as possible, and that if, despite all efforts to gain their participation, Arab States were still reluctant to join, efforts shld be made to continue organization without them. FonMin emphasized in latter connection that agreement with Brit was that sponsoring powers shld proceed to carry out organ in some way, although he believes there is no necessity for deciding now just how this is to be done if proposal is rejected by Arab States.

2. British agreed with Turk viewpoint that every effort shld be made to get Arabs into MEDO from beginning. British abandoned their idea of proceeding without Arabs in hope of their joining later—the "setting up shop and waiting for customers" approach. FonMin considered this significant step forward in understanding between Turks and US on one hand and Brits on other.

3. Brits agreed to abandon idea that first invitation shld be written, and accepted Turk proposal that each Arab State be sounded out orally. Decision could be made later, in light Arab States' reaction, as to whether or not written invitation shld be extended. FonMin stated principal objective of tactics in approach on MEDO shld be to avoid consideration of question by Arab League. Turks feel that written invitation wld inevitably result in this.

4. FonMin told me in strict confidence of conversation which Turk Amb Cairo had with Naguib upon possibility Egypt joining MEDO (reported separately by Embtel 543, Oct 24),[5] results of which indicated Egypt not likely join under any circumstances until Canal Zone evacuated. On other hand, from PriMin and FonMin's conversation in London with Iraqi Regent (reported London's reftel) he thinks there is good chance that Iraq wld be prepared to join. Regent had inquired re results of FonMin meetings with British and said he was looking to Turkey to protect Iraqi interests in meetings. Commented that if Turkey alone had made MEC proposals last year they wld have been much more effective. Regent wished to have further talks with FonMin after elections in Iraq in about two months. FonMin informed Brits of this conversation, asking them not to mention it to French.

Section two of two.

5. FonMin felt situations in Egypt and Iraq as reported above support validity Turk view that sounding out orally by friendly countries was preferble method of proceeding enlist support for MEDO. FonMin proposed to Eden that first démarche to Arab State be made by Turkey to Iraq, which because of border with Iran FonMin considers Arab State most exposed to possible Russian aggression. Eden agreed despite Brit treaty with that country. Brits wld at same time advise Iraqi they were aware of Turk approach and supported move. Eden also agreed Turk suggestion that US similarly advise Iraqi.

6. FonMin believes decision re further approaches shld depend in some measure on Iraqi response. Perhaps Iraqi themselves might suggest next step. FonMin's present views are that Jordan shld be next country and shld be approached by UK, followed by Saudi Arabia with US taking lead, and Lebanon with approach by Turkey. If there are other acceptances Syria might join without approach. If approach necessary shld be made by Turkey or US. In response to my query re French attitude toward allowing another country to make approach in Lebanon and Syria, FonMin stated he recognized this problem, which was, however, not discussed in London. FonMin felt, if necessary, matter shld be put up to Fr frankly with fact of Brit foregoing first contact with Iraq as example most desirable arrangement whereby national and prestige interests subordinated to general good. FonMin advised that Eden was seeing Schuman in Paris in few days and wld present to latter conclusions reached on approach to Arab States in very general terms only, since French particularly sensitive to prestige considerations involved in approach to Arab States. Eden promised to send FonMin minutes of these conversations with French.

7. Reverting to Egypt, I pointed out US thinking has been that, because of Egypt's position in Arab world and fact it had originally been invited to be sponsoring power, it shall be approached first. I inquired re Turk estimate Egyptian reaction to proposed initial approach to Iraq. FonMin replied that in his judgment Gen Naguib cld not accept MEDO proposal in absence Brit evacuation, which was not discussed in London. He thought best course wld be to tell Egyptians frankly that we were willing to discuss MEDO proposal with them at any time Egypt wished; however, that we proposed proceed with discussions with Iraq, which was most vulnerable Arab country.

8. FonMin stated it was agreed in London to report conversations to US, both through London and Ankara Embassies, and to urge US to agree to conclusions reached.

Altho foregoing report of Turk-Brit conversation injected new elements into situation, I outlined to FonMin substance Depcirtel 449, Oct 17.[2] I pointed out agreements reached in London had raised two points of difference with views set forth by Dept, namely (a) that original approach shld be a sounding out rather than a written proposal and (b) that first approach shld be to Iraq rather than to Egypt. I told him I wld report fully to Dept what FonMin had told me and wld advise him of our reaction, which was probably already being formulated on basis Brit report on London meeting. I emphasized that we wished await Arab reactions before deciding how to proceed further. In event strong adverse reaction we might prefer proceeding with mil planning by sponsoring powers without fanfare. FonMin said this not inconsistent Turk view and what he considered to be agreement in London.

Re proposed Brit note, which FonMin saw in London, he stated in early part of conversation before learning of UO [US?] views that he considered text adequate as first draft and had no particular desire to suggest changes at this time. He commented favorably on ref to Paris statement of principles. He, of course, emphasized that present Turk-Brit proposal wld involve no written communication in initial contacts.

Assuming necessity for written communication at some time in negots, Emb believes that modifications suggested by Dept wld greatly improve text. Emb wld recommend elaborating upon those aspects of principles which wld be attractive to Arabs. Agree that effort shld be made where appropriate to utilize wording of Arab security pact, avoiding any written mention of pact itself.

543. In course conversation Oct 23 (Embtel 542 Oct 24 [2] to Dept rptd London 55 Cairo 9) FonMin stated he was able advise me in strictest confidence of results recent talk between Turk Amb Cairo and Gen Naguib. Latter had specifically requested this conversation be kept secret and Turks proposed tell only Brits and US. Conversation resulted from instructions to Turk Amb on Oct 9 to obtain personal reaction Naguib to Egyptian participation MEDO. Specified this should not appear be official approach or in behalf other powers but made appear spontaneous.

First conversation was with Egyptian FonMin who stated in his judgment it would not be possible for Egypt to become member MEDO as long as Canal Zone occupied by Brits. Egyptian FonMin then suggested Amb ask Naguib personally what his own views were and arranged rendezvous.

Ambs report this conversation Oct 16 states that Naguib said in his opinion it was in Egypt's interest enter organization such as MEDO but this not possible until Canal Zone evacuated. He made number of complaints against Brit Egyptian policy, including fact Egypt helped UK during war but received nothing as result; Brit owed Egypt 300 million pounds unpaid; recently deblocked five million pounds in manner which appeared place UK in light performing generous act. Notwithstanding this, however, Naguib strongly favored reaching understanding with Brits and will try to do so. He is however not hopeful. Commented he was not so foolish as Wafd to fight Brits, but could not agree to any course other than evacuation canal.

When Turk Amb attempted present advantages Egypt membership in MEDO, Naguib said he thought there would also be disadvantages. If Egypt joined, other Arab states would follow suit. If later MEDO did not prove satisfactory Egypt could withdraw, but other countries, particularly Syria and Iraq, who do not have great differences with UK, might find MEDO to their advantage and stay in. Egypt would then be left isolated.

Naguib stated Arabs ready assume obligation defend their own soil if provided with arms. Canal Zone must be defended by Egypt. Turk Amb pointed out Egypt not able defend canal, which important not only to Egypt but for defense of entire ME. He argued it unwise reserve defense of ME to local troops alone, but reliance must be placed upon outside help. Naguib responded UK to blame for Egyptian lack preparedness since UK thinks Egypt would use against UK and Israel any arms which might be provided. Naguib assured Amb he is not foolish enough to fight powerful country such as UK nor to fight Israel, but is trying to develop good relations with all countries.

Naguib summarized position by saying that until Canal Zone evacuated Egyptians had better stay by themselves. Amb commented that Russians may not let them stay by themselves and cited danger that Russian paratroopers could seize Canal Zone. Naguib replied simply that UK must resolve present dilemma and that he hoped they would choose right course. He agreed however to study question of participation in MEDO and to discuss matter further with Amb within 2–3 weeks.

Turk FonMin, in advising me of foregoing, said that question evacuation Brit troops not discussed in London nor has he discussed it with Brit Amb Ankara. Churchill did in London mtgs make some passing comment in offhand way that if Egyptians continued to be as difficult as they had in past he would move his troops to Cyprus. FonMin emphasized this could not be taken as considered judgment.

General Bradley: Before we begin on the Middle East, there is one point I would like to take up. We have a message drafted to send Clark which gives him authority to release the movies and other material on the POW's in our camps. There is a question of whether or not the commercial press should be allowed to interview the prisoners. This message gives Clark discretion. We understand this has been worked out with your people but we thought we might just check with you before sending it off.

Mr. Bohlen: It seems to me the only question would be one of timing, particularly with the General Assembly Debate coming up.

General Lemnitzer: The actual timing of it would be coordinated by your people so that it will fit in with what is happening in the General Assembly. I think that can be worked out satisfactorily.

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Matthews: We have had your letter [3] which brings out the point that you will need time for careful study before you can treat the Middle Eastern force requirements and which lays out some of the general strategic considerations of the Middle East Defense. There are some questions of timing which we have to meet which we thought would be useful for Byroade to present to you today.

Mr. Byroade: Our general strategic concept in the past has been based on UK responsibility for the Middle East. With the developments of the past few years we have felt the need to review our general approach to the Middle East and in connection with that we asked the JCS to provide a military paper. We realize the difficulty of the questions that are involved in the Middle East Defense. But there are several factors which make a review of our general approach to the area urgent. When we survey the Middle Eastern area we cannot but be impressed by both the importance of the area to the United States and the present widespread instability in the area. In this important and unstable region we are now essentially carrying on only Point-Four activities. We feel that we must do more than this. We have been studying very carefully economic developmental projects which might be undertaken, but we are told by our people in the field that at the present time we could probably secure quicker and greater political gains from relatively small programs of military assistance and provision of military equipment than we could from economic assistance. Right now, for example, in Egypt there is a situation in which a moderate amount of military assistance might be calculated to promise really important political dividends. Iraq and Pakistan are also areas where prospects exist that military assistance would be politically valuable. From the purely political as apart from the military point of view we have come to the conclusion that we should ask for military assistance funds in the next year's budget and that we should not merely rely on the 10 per cent transfer provision of the Greek-Turkish appropriation. From our conversations with the office of the Secretary of Defense we gain the impression that the bottleneck in military assistance might in the future be one of dollars rather than equipment. From the political point of view we arrive at the tentative conclusion that something of the order of two hundred million dollars might be requested. I have already talked with the Budget Bureau and have presented the case for a military assistance program for the Middle East from a political and not military point of view. Some time ago the Budget Bureau asked when the military case would be provided. Originally I told them I thought it might be forthcoming the first of November. Yesterday I talked with them again and said I didn't know when it would be available. On this part of the problem I have a question—whether we need an exhaustive formal JCS study or whether some general statements of military desirability are not what is called for.

[3] The letter from the Secretary of Defense, dated Oct. 28, is not printed, but see footnote 3, Document 83. (780.5/10-2852)

General Bradley: There is no question that we are in favor of MEDO and that military assistance to the area would be important. But the question that we were asked dealt with force requirements. We don't have enough information to give a really adequate answer on force requirements, and we can't expect to get a really accurate answer until we have a MEDO planning organization which could provide detailed information on the capabilities and potential forces of the countries of the area. The British have made an estimate of force requirements for the defense of the Middle East on a forward line. It runs to something like 20 divisions and 1200 aircraft. Without careful study of the situation we hesitate to put the stamp of JCS approval on any such estimate.

Mr. Nitze: Would the British force requirement estimates include or exclude the 10 Turkish Divisions.

Col. Wright: They included 10 Turkish Divisions and as I remember 9 other divisions for the other sectors, making a total of 19.

General Bradley: We have asked our planning teams which are working on 1955–56 requirements to provide us with information on the Middle East by the first of July next year. We have already asked them to push up our deadline to the first of January. I don't see how you could speed up their work any more than that and hope to get anything out of it.

Mr. Byroade: What we need at this time is a fairly general statement which would justify a budget request.

General Bradley: The difficulty is we don't know the status of the units in the area, the size of the forces or their make-up. I can't help but be concerned with the embarrassing questions I might have to answer on the Hill in defense of a budget request.

Mr. Nitze: Isn't it a question as to whether on the one hand it is better not to go up to the Hill with a request for military assistance funds for the Middle East or whether we should ask for it now but say frankly the area has hitherto been a British responsibility, that we will have to carefully study precisely what needs to be done but that we feel that appropriations for military assistance now would be a useful tool in dealing with the area.

General Bradley: It seems to me that it is sensible to save a year by making the request now, even though we would have to say that we don't have full knowledge of just what the situation is.

General Cabell: Isn't the problem that State needs a testimonial for budget purposes. The JCS is not in a position to give this testimonial by normal planning processes and in that case wouldn't it be useful for State to draft the kind of statement that they think they need and to check it with our people.

Admiral Duncan: It seems to me that we do have one question to consider and that is what we could say to objections about the capabilities of the people in the area to assimilate, use, and maintain military equipment that we might provide. My impression is that there are fairly severe limits along this line.

Mr. Byroade: We will have a list of military items from Egypt in a couple of weeks. Admittedly, this is not a systematic way of going about the problem. It really is a question of timing.

General Bradley: It would seem to me that it was better not to lose a year by attempting to be too systematic. I have a question as to whether you are including India in this program.

Mr. Byroade: It might be that for political reasons we would have to do something for India, particularly if Pakistan were given military assistance. There are other places such as Syria and Egypt where military equipment could be of immediate utility to the forces they already have organized and would bring political dividends.

Mr. Nitze: We also had related questions in connection with the studies that are now going on under the directive which stems from NSC 135.[4] It is difficult to get ahead with these studies without comments from the Joint Staff, and NSC 135 particularly stressed that we should look into the possibilities of doing more in the Near East and Far East.

[4] Regarding NSC 135, see the editorial note, vol. II, Part 1, p. 56.

General Bradley: We can make a general statement but we wouldn't be in a position to draw specific force tabs.

Mr. Nitze: We can understand that. What we would like, however, would be general support for the budget justification, and the best advice that you people can give us at this stage on NSC 135.

Mr. Matthews: What about Cabell's suggestion that State should draft a general statement. I should think it would be useful if someone from your staff could work with us in getting up such a statement.

General Bradley: We can have Colonel Breit of the Joint Staff work with you on the general statement, but I think when it comes to testimony on the Hill we are going to have to be in a better position than we are now. Some of us will probably have to make a swing around and look into the situation in the area.

[Here follows discussion of the Party Congress in Moscow.]

MIDDLE EAST

Admiral Duncan: I would like to go back for a minute to the Middle East question and ask whether the proposed program would supplant the 10 per cent transfer arrangement that we have now.

Mr. Byroade: We would prefer to keep the flexibility which we gained from the 10 per cent transfer clause and still get additional funds for this area.

Admiral Duncan: It seems to me there is a real question—what programs the equipment would come out of. Right now we are having a hard time to get material to match appropriated funds. Tossing in another two-hundred million dollar appropriation wouldn't really answer the question where the equipment was coming from.

Mr. Byroade: It was my understanding that money rather than equipment would pretty soon be the major problem.

General Bradley: In general terms of availability of steel and materials, I understand that resources will not be the problem by about next fall.

General Lemnitzer: The difficulty is that we need the same kind of items for South Korea, Indochina, and Formosa as we do for the Middle East, and even though there is plenty of steel there is a wide gap between availability of steel and weapons production.

Mr. Nitze: It seems clear that there will be two phases. Right now, even though you need to appropriate money for any new programs, it may be that you won't have immediately the equipment to spend the money for. Within a fairly short period of time the problem will change to one of not having enough money to keep the present productive facilities going.

Admiral Duncan: We still have to face the question of how to fit in this Middle East program with other programs.

Mr. Nitze: We had hoped that the NSC 135 exercise might give some guidance in answering that question.

Mr. Matthews: Schuman and Eden will be coming over and will be talking with our Secretary very shortly. They may raise questions having to do with the recent 5-Power Military talks on Southeast Asia. [5] We were wondering when we could hear what the results of those talks were.

General Bradley: There is a report which hasn't been approved by the JCS, but we can give you copies of that right away.

911. Dept has now been officially informed of Anglo-Turk talks reported London's 2304 to Dept Oct 20 and their decision Iraq shld be approached first re MEDO. Dept's tentative view re this proposal fol reasoning Baghdad's 520 Oct 22 and 531 Oct 24 is that we shld concentrate on key to common defense planning; i.e., Egypt, since if we can obtain Egypt adherence to MEDO concept, other Arab states more apt follow suit. Replies from missions in Arab states to Depcirtels 449 and 450 indicate that other Arab states will not be willing join common defense planning prior settlement outstanding issues between UK and Egypt.

Having in mind comments Cairo's 1007 Oct 21 to Dept Amin's comments reported Cairo's 886 Oct 8 to Dept [2] and public statements Egypt policy, we concur approach to Naguib re MEDO wld be useless and wld stand more than fair chance summary rejection without settlement base issue, based on evacuation to agreed extent Brit troops. We also concur that base settlement and MEDO cld only be given meaning with material assistance to Egypt by US and UK.

[1] Handed to the British Ambassador by Matthews on Nov. 5, with a request that the Ambassador transmit it to London. Drafted by Stabler, and cleared by Acheson, Bonbright, Matthews, Ferguson, and Byroade.

A memorandum of the Nov. 5 conversation at the Department of State, not printed, stated that Matthews told the British Ambassador the United States did not intend to inform the Turks of the message until it had received the British reaction, and hoped the British would not discuss it with them either, but the United States did want to discuss the matter with the Turks as soon as possible because they had informed us of the meetings in London in October. Middle East Defense Organization which took place in London from October 16 to 18.[2]

The United States Government has given most careful consideration to the views of the United Kingdom and Turkey on the desirability of the first approach on the Middle East Defense Organization being made to Iraq by Turkey.

The United States Government after full reflection on the views set forth by the United Kingdom and Turkey, still believes that Egypt, not Iraq, is the key to this question and that no other Arab state would be willing to consider participation in the Middle East Defense Organization until the present difficulties between Egypt and the United Kingdom are settled. The United States Government shares the desire of the United Kingdom and Turkey for the early establishment of the Middle East Defense Organization. Therefore if Egypt is the key to its establishment, as the United States Government believes, our efforts at this time should be concentrated on the principal objective.

It is the firm belief of the United States Government that an approach to Egypt at this time regarding the Middle East Defense Organization will not succeed unless it is accompanied by a clear and precise offer to Egypt with respect to a prompt settlement of the Suez Canal Base question.

It is also the belief of the United States Government that material assistance to Egypt by the United States and the United Kingdom which will give the Naguib Government tangible evidence of support to his regime is an indispensable element to the achievement of the objectives which are sought. Material assistance would include such arms as might be considered necessary to raise the level of the Egyptian Armed Forces to the point where they could play a useful role in Middle East defense.

The United States Government therefore proposes that the United Kingdom urgently formulate the precise lines of a Base settlement which would be strategically acceptable to the Western powers, but which would, at the same time, stand a chance of acceptance by the Naguib Government. Such a settlement would probably have to include the principle of evacuation of British troops on a phased basis. In this connection it is noted that certain proposals regarding a settlement are now being considered by the British Government.

At such time as the elements of a Base settlement have been formulated, which we believe could be accepted by Egypt, it is proposed that the United States would approach General Naguib and suggest that the United States, United Kingdom and Egypt work out in secret both the Suez Canal Base settlement and Egyptian adherence to common defense planning. It is also proposed that at some appropriate stage after the agreement had been worked out secretly, the United Kingdom would announce its plans regarding evacuation. Egypt would at the same time undertake to work as rapidly as possible towards public announcement of its adherence to the Middle East Defense Organization.

[2] A copy of the British document of Oct. 27 has not been found in Department of State files; but see telegram 911 to Cairo, repeated to London as 3072, Oct. 31, supra.

Prior to or concurrent with the approach to General Naguib suggested in the above paragraph, it might be possible to work out a program of assistance to Egypt, both in the military and economic fields, which would make more possible an agreement concerning the Base and the Middle East Defense Organization.

The United States Government also proposes that the initial secret approach to Egypt should be followed without undue delay by an exploratory approach to the other Arab states on the Middle East Defense Organization. It is believed that a favorable course of United States-United Kingdom-Egyptian negotiations would improve the climate of discussions with the other Arab states. The timing of the approach to the other Arab states would depend to some degree on the reception which would be accorded by General Naguib to the initial approach to Egypt.

It is apparent that it will not be possible to obtain Egyptian participation in common defense planning without a settlement of the Canal Zone Base problem. Since it is generally desired to establish the Middle East Defense Organization as soon as possible and since this can best be done with Egyptian adherence, the United States considers that the United States and the United Kingdom should press forward with all possible speed in working out the various elements of the Base settlement and an approach to Egypt. The United States is encouraged by the improved atmosphere with respect to the Anglo-Egyptian situation and by the progress which is apparently being made on the Sudan, compensation and other matters. The United States believes that it would be desirable to take advantage of the present opportunities to initiate negotiation of a settlement with Egypt.

The United States for its part would be willing to take an active part in the negotiations with Egypt with a view to facilitating an agreement between Egypt and the United Kingdom. [3]

Subject: Interim British Reply to U.S. Views on MEDO Approach to Iraq

Participants: Mr. B. A. B. Burrows, Counselor of the British Embassy
NEA—Mr. Jernegan
NE—Mr. Ortiz

Mr. Burrows, Counselor of the British Embassy, called at his request to report on the interim British reaction to our memorandum of November 5 [2] giving our views on the advisability of an approach to Iraq to join the MEDO. Mr. Burrows gave the Department's representatives the following extract from a Foreign Office telegram of November 8 which was indicative of the British reaction to our November 5 note:

> "As far as Turkish soundings in Iraq are concerned, the Turkish Government have told us that they have now decided to defer any specific approach until after the Iraqi elections.
> "We agree with the State Department that the Egyptian attitude is the key factor and that an approach to Egypt regarding M.E.D.O. is unlikely to produce any positive result unless it is accompanied by proposals for a settlement of the Suez Canal question. We welcome the United States expression of interest in negotiations with Egypt with a view to facilitating an Anglo-Egyptian agreement and we will produce proposals for a settlement for discussion with the Americans as soon as possible.
> "As regards the suggestion of a programme of military and economic assistance we consider that such an offer should be linked with acceptance by Egypt of the principle of joint defense and preferably worked out through M.E.D.O. It will be our main inducement to Egypt to co-operate in Middle East defense.
> "In the meantime, we propose to continue to try to reach firm agreement with the other Sponsor Powers on the functions and form of M.E.D.O."

Mr. Jernegan, while acknowledging the interim nature of the British reply, pointed out that with respect to the third paragraph of the reply it would not be possible for either the U.K. or the U.S.

to take a firm position on military and economic assistance to Egypt until a reply from the Egyptian Government to our message of October 6 had been received and studied. In our message we made clear that U.S. assistance to Egypt would be largely conditioned by the attitude of the Egyptian Government towards cooperating in the defense of the Near East. Insofar as economic assistance to Egypt was concerned, the Egyptians have so far not made any specific requests of great significance. The U.S. in the meantime is continuing to expand its Point IV Program. [3]

Mr. Jernegan indicated our agreement with the wisdom of the Turkish decision to defer any specific approach to Iraq until after the Iraqi elections had taken place. He said that the U.S. assumed that there would be further consultation on the subject of initial MEDO approaches.

Aside from these comments, it was agreed not to go into greater detail in view of the provisional nature of the British reply.

[3] For the Egyptian reply received by the Embassy in Cairo on Nov. 10 and considered by the Department to provide the basis for a limited program of assistance "at this time", see Document 1024. Accordingly, the Department on Nov. 21 initiated a series of exchanges with the Department of Defense, extending to Dec. 29, in which the Department of State formally recommended the extension of certain military aid to Egypt as being politically essential for the purpose of obtaining desired U.S. politico-military objectives in the Near East. [3] The British memorandum entitled "Middle East Defence Organization," not printed, is in PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Near and Middle East, 1952-53".

Begin summary. Assoc Pak in defense ME has always been object UK policy. Pak potentially has valuable contribution make to ME defense. It occupies strategic position great importance to control of Persian Gulf. Moreover Pak anxious play leading part among Moslem powers of ME and realizes disturbances in ME affects its own security.[4]

However soundings of GOP in past indicated that in their view it wld be difficult enter into any external commitments so long as Kashmir unsettled. Care will be needed therefore to avoid approaching Pak in such way to get definite negative reply which wld be embarrassing for future. It must be recognized also that in present circumstances amount practical assistance which Pak cld give wld be extremely limited.

MEDO offers opportunity ventilating with Pak possibility its assoc now or future date while avoiding difficulties with which proposal for full scale command org at this juncture wld have confronted GOP and UK. Moreover if Arab states are to be approached re MEDO Pak wld be affronted if UK did not take it equally into its confidence.

UK proposes therefore to inform GOP re MEDO proposals, explaining these proposals still under discussion between sponsor powers and that steps being taken to sound out attitude selected Arab states. UK HICOM Karachi wld also explain that if Pak desired come in as participating member MEDO it wld be welcome; but decision must be matter for Pak itself and if it felt it to be decision which it wld prefer postpone that wld be understood.

In view Ind gen policy "non alignment" Ind participation in MEDO does not arise. At same time it is important inform GOI at early stage what arrangements are proposed, not only on gen grounds but also because otherwise approach to GOP might give rise to dangerous rumors and suspicions in Ind. Apart from Ind fear that Western powers, in seeking to secure Pak coop, will strengthen Pak against Ind, latter has always been nervous of moves which might be regarded as tending to entangle subcontinent in Western-Sov struggle. It is probably not fully possible to dispel such suspicions but it is very desirable every effort shld be made insure Ind attitude toward MEDO and toward approach to Pak is not unfriendly. UK proposes therefore inform GOI informally of MEDO proposals and of communication made to Pak. It wld also inform Pak nature info given to Ind.

UK ready make these approaches to Pak and Ind at any time once process approaching Arab states begins but exact timing wld depend on circumstances. UK trusts there will be no objection on part sponsoring powers in proceeding along above lines. Similar communication will be made to govts of France, Turk, Austral, NZ and SoAfr. End summary.

[4] Telegram 808 from Ankara, Feb. 22, 1952, not printed, reported a conversation on Feb. 21 between Ambassador McGhee and Zafrullah Khan, the Foreign Minister of Pakistan who was visiting Turkey at the time. McGhee reported the Foreign Minister urged the Turks to show more sympathy for the Arab States; suggested closer consultation among the Moslem States, using the British Commonwealth as an example; and suggested a meeting of the Moslem Prime Ministers. (682.90D/2-2252) Telegram 1008 from Ankara, Apr. 3, not printed, suggested that initiative such as that taken by Pakistan in calling a meeting of the Moslem States, might be a stabilizing element in the Middle East if divorced from religion and based on solid political, strategic, economic, and cultural factors. (780.00/4-352) The proposed meeting of the Moslem States was not held.

Depts position re UK proposal has been communicated to UK Govt and is summarized as fols:

1. Dept plsd with UK proposal and if circumstances appropriate will be prepared support UK its approach. UK aware that GOP rep approached US during Jul 1952 re credit assistance of about 200 million dols for US arms.[5] If question arms assistance arises between Pak and US in context Pak assoc with MEDO, Dept proposes to say that under present circumstances there obviously can be no firm program for 1954 FY but that US wld want to take into account in its future program for ME Paks participation.
2. Dept shares UKs concern over possibility unfav Ind reaction and also shares fully its desire minimize Ind suspicions. Dept therefore will welcome further consultations to this end; in meantime it agrees with UK proposal to inform Ind.
3. Info as to timing proposed talks with Ind and Pak will be appreciated. Dept considers approach to Pak might be made most appropriately at about time matter first discussed with Arab states. End summary.

On these grounds no sensible person cld question creation of MEDO or eventual inclusion of Pak in its orbit. For reason of geography, history, politics, economics and religion, future Pak is closely linked with that of countries to its immed west and they with Pak. In face of threat of Sov aggression all of them must sooner or later hang together or assuredly they may hang separately.

I wld however raise two serious points regarding recent agreement to invite Pak to participate in MEDO at this time. These points relate to effect on other ME countries such as Iran, Afghan and India and to concept of participation itself. I, of course, speak without authority of intimate knowledge of Iran and Afghan.

I wonder, however, if Pak participation MEDO at this time may not increase Sov pressures on these two countries, and if Afghans and Iranians will not resent any move to strengthen org in which they do not participate. Wld welcome views of Ambs Henderson and Ward.

On India's reaction I can speak with far more knowledge and assurance. There is no doubt whatsoever that India will be deeply resentful and fol developments appear inevitable.

1. GOI and public opinion leaders will accept move as confirmation London rumored US deal for a Pak base.
2. It will be assumed that US-UK res on Kashmir which everyone here both in and out of govt considers strongly pro-Pak and anti-India is down payment for these bases.
3. Fact that UK, France and South Africa, all of which are regarded in Asia as colonial powers are assoc with move will be accepted as evidence that US is party to an effort to perpetuate a dying colonial order in name of collective security.
4. Timing of this move following election of new US admin will indicate that a basic change of US fon policy with greater emphasis on military is already under way.
5. Effect on US-Indian relations will certainly include extreme coolness and increasing tendency to reject sincerity of our views on such broader issues as Korea, NATO and disarmament. Bitter statements will surely be made here by Nehru and others which will stimulate similar responses in US. As a result Indian economic aid situation will face new difficulties. Much of the ground gained in them last several months will be lost.
6. Soviet and Commie Chi will be given a shiny new propaganda weapon with which to "prove" that US has at long last "shown its true imperialistic colors".
7. Ind-Pak relations will become far more explosive and any hope of settling Kashmir dispute will be greatly reduced. Although these reactions may appear both ridiculous and unrealistic to Dept they are almost certain to materialize and they will come from many sincere Indians ardently anti-Commie and pro-US. It wld be the worst kind of folly for us to brush them aside.

I hope that the Dept will consider carefully my October 28 letter to the Secy [2] on what we believe to be the danger India's slipping behind the Iron Curtain in next few years and direct and indirect results of such a disaster. Whatever mil benefits may be derived from participation of Pak in MEDO must be carefully weighed against the certain reaction here.

The dangers to US-Ind relations cld be lessened somewhat by broadening concept of MEDO participation to include Iran, Afghan, India and even Ceylon as well as Pak. If that were done—even with certainty of refusal by one or all, at least India wld have less basis for imagining participation were directed against her. But regardless of how the cloth is cut Dept must understand that this proposal will have serious repercussions here. [3]

[1] The meeting was held in the Pentagon at 3:45 p. m. A notation on the first page of the minutes reads: "Draft not cleared by any participants."

General Bradley explained that the JCS had arranged this briefing session for the State Department in reply to the Department's request for an appreciation of the problem of holding the Middle East and the force requirements involved. He said that the Joint Chiefs had not as yet made a detailed study of the Middle East and that for purposes of this presentation, principal reliance would have to be placed on British estimates. The estimates presented were based on a joint US–UK field study and were the best currently available. Undoubtedly they would be further improved as we secured better intelligence on the capabilities of the Near Eastern countries, concerning which as yet we have relatively little first hand information. They will also be subject to change on the basis of such further information on enemy capabilities as may be afforded by intelligence operations and reconnaissance. The basic strategic concept in this appreciation—the holding of the "outer ring"—was British. It involved the holding of a line based on the Taurus Mountains in Southern Turkey and the Zagros Mountains in Iraq and Iran, and would thus safeguard the major oil production areas of the Middle East. The nature of the terrain was such that, to carry beyond the mountain line, a Russian offensive would have to funnel through mountain defiles or passes; thus the ground defense of the area would involve primarily the task of holding these passes.

The estimated threat and the forces in terms of US divisions needed to meet the threat were shown in a table reproduced below:

	The Threat	Needed To meet threat
	Ground		Reserves
Cilician Gates	2 divs. D+5 5 Divs. D+7	3 Divs.	2 inf.
Malatya Pass	2 divs. D+5 6 Divs. D+7	4 Divs.	1 armored
Ruwandiz Pass	1⅓ divs. D+1-D+4	1⅓ Div.
Senna Pass	⅔ divs. D+1-D+4
Partak Pass	5 divs. D+1-D+4	3 div.	2 inf.
Khurammabad Pass	2 divs. D+1-D+4	1 div.	1 armored
Bandar Abbas	⅓ divs. D+1-D+4	⅔ div.
Total	20⅓ divs.	17 inf., Air	2 armored
1,400 Tactical A/C		1,200 A/C

Aircraft requirments shown are exclusive of assistance which might be provided by aircraft carriers in the Mediterranean.

In addition to the ground forces shown in the table, the Soviets might also drop up to three airborne brigades at any place behind the line. One could get some idea of the scope of the operations involved in this plan by comparing the length of the line, which was approximately 1,780 miles, with the 150 mile length presently held by the United Nations in Korea.

The Soviets' principal naval effort would be directed at the disruption of sealines. In the Mediterranean, the threat would be minor at first but would increase as the Soviets conquered Mediterranean ports. The principal Soviet effort in the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf would be mine laying from the air.

The following forces are presently available to meet a Soviet offensive:

NOW AVAILABLE TO MEET REQUIREMENTS

	Ground	Air	Sea
Turkey	9 inf. 1 armd. div.
UK	1 inf.	UK 250 A/C
Jordan	⅓ inf.
Iraq	⅔ inf.
Total	11 inf. 1 armd. div.
Deficit	6 inf. 1 armd. div.	950	30–40 AMS

Necessary logistical and support troops represent an additional ground deficiency, not shown in the table. Of the 1200 aircraft required, the UK has only about 136 presently available, but these might be built up to 250 within a relatively short period. The Turkish Air Force could be utilized for limited support of ground forces but no other assistance is in sight and the net deficit would stand at around 950 aircraft. Naval air strength in the Mediterranean might provide some assistance, but this would be necessarily limited. The only Naval deficits would be approximately 30 to 40 coastal craft and mine sweepers.

By 1955 it might be possible to build up the following defensive strength in the area.

POSSIBLY AVAILABLE BY 1955 TO MEET REQUIREMENTS

	Ground	Air		Sea
Turkey	9 inf. 1 armd.
UK	1 inf. 1 armd.	UK	465
Iraq	2 inf.	Turkey	75
Iran	1 inf.	Israel	80
		Total	620
Israel	2 inf.
	16 inf. 2 armd. div.
Deficit	1 inf.		580	30–40 AMS

On the basis of the build-up assumed in the above table there would be in 1955 a ground deficit of one infantry division plus the necessary supporting troops and an air deficit of about 580 planes, the equivalent of eight US wings. It was possible that Australia and New Zealand might assist in meeting the ground force deficiencies and the aircraft deficit might be reduced somewhat by the use of carrier planes.

General Bradley emphasized that the figures for potential ground strength were based on the most optimistic assumptions. It was also necessary to make clear that the sources of equipment for the additional ground forces shown had not been determined and that UK build-up capabilities were not known. The requirements for troop transport and logistic support were omitted because these must depend on the detailed plans adopted.

General Bradley concluded his presentation by emphasizing the need for the early establishment of a Middle East Defense Organization which would do the military planning required and urged that the maximum effort be made to solve as much of the Middle East political problem as possible.

Mr. Bruce: Does the estimate of the net build-up required by 1955 imply no increase in U.S.S.R. strength available for a Middle East attack?

General Bradley: That is correct. The Soviets have had the same total number of divisions for the last several years. Although they are constantly improving the quality of existing forces there has been no increase in quantity.

General Collins: The estimates assume that the attack on the Middle East would be part of a world war and the forces shown are those which it is estimated the Soviets could support in the Middle East.

Mr. Bruce: The estimates also reflect our knowledge of present Soviet troop dispositions, do they not?

General Bradley: Yes. And they also take into account lines of communication and the forces which could be supported over these lines.

Mr. Bruce: Is it assumed that the attacking forces would be exclusively Russian?

General Bradley: No. We must take into account the possibility that some satellite forces would be used in an attack against Western Turkey.

General Collins: What we have here is an estimate of what the U.S.S.R. and its satellites could do against the Middle East while moving simultaneously against Europe and the Far East. G–2 estimates that they would have 23 to 24 divisions available out of a grand total of 175.

General Bradley: The estimates assume that after the Turkish retreat to the Taurus Mountain line, there would be 10 Turkish divisions left. Naturally, we hope that the Turks would be able to hold a line farther forward. We cannot assume however that the Turks will provide any portion of the estimated force deficiency outside of Turkey.

General Collins: The nature and direction of the Russian threat will depend on what they consider to be the most important strategic objective. Is it the Suez or Persian-Iraqi oil? If it is the oil, they might succeed in taking this objective without attacking Turkey at all.

Mr. Matthews: Would there not be an advantage in attempting to create the six additional Turkish divisions which have been discussed from time to time?

General Collins: There is no doubt but what six mobile Turkish divisions would constitute a potent threat on the flank of a Russian advance. However, if the objective is the oil fields of Iran and Iraq, they could reach these while by-passing Turkey entirely.

Mr. Byroade: What are our estimates as to the speed of the UK build-up?

General Bradley: By D+6 months they would expect to have a total of 5 divisions in the area. The 2 divisions shown in the table would be in the area on D-day. There will be some problem as to where to station these forces if the British evacuate the Suez. Some of them could be placed in Cyprus, of course.

General Collins: It will also be a problem to find a place to stockpile the necessary ammunition and equipment. As far as troops are concerned, we might have a very useful addition if we could bring Pakistan to cooperate. Of course, we realize a settlement with India will be necessary before this is possible.

Mr. Byroade: We have received a pretty clear indication that the Pakistanis would join with us provided that sufficient equipment was promised to make possible a really substantial build-up of Pakistani forces. Any such move as this would of course run directly into the Kashmir problem[2] but we may have to meet this one head on, sooner or later.

Mr. Matthews: The table shows no contribution from the Commonwealth. Isn't it possible to get some forces from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa?

General Bradley: None of these countries has any peace-time military establishment so that forces must be raised, trained, organized and equipped. It would be a good performance to have any forces from these countries in action in the Middle East inside a year after hostilities begin.

Mr. Nitze: The air deficiency looks very serious.

General Vandenberg: That is largely a question of equipment and what can be made available.

General Bradley: The difficulty is the great expense of maintaining airforces. Even when we have promising personnel with which to build up indigenous forces, this can only be done at the cost of a substantial contribution from the United States. We are discovering this in Turkey.

General Collins: The Turks can barely maintain the ground forces they have now. Air strength comes at our expense.

Mr. Jernegan: Must we also consider the possibility of a Soviet attack on Afghanistan and Pakistan simultaneously with a thrust through Iran?

General Bradley: Yes, that must be considered a definite possibility. The U.S.S.R. would be very concerned about the airfields in these countries which are very close to important Russian strategic targets. Unless there is sufficient strength in being to serve as a deterrent, the U.S.S.R. would probably move to eliminate this threat.

General Vandenberg: When I was in India recently I found that in spite of the official line of the Indian political leaders, the military officials are very concerned about the Communist threat. The Chinese Communists are building important airfields in the area just North of India and Communist intentions do not appear as peaceful as Nehru asserts.

Mr. Byroade: Should we now make plans with the British to attempt to hold a piece of the area before 1955?

General Collins: Before we answer that we have got to decide what our main interest is. Is it oil, the gate-way to Africa, or the Arab States? What you decide will affect substantially what you do. I think we could probably hold the Suez, but there is no chance to hold the Persian Gulf. In the event of war, no one is going to get refined oil products out of the Middle East. The refineries can be readily put out of commission by air attacks. As for unrefined products, the Soviets won't get much. There is only one railroad from the oil producing areas into Russia and this is highly vulnerable. There is also one highway over which the oil could be trucked but the Russians lack tank cars. The West will not get much oil either. The pipelines to the Mediterranean could be easily broken while the entry to the Persian Gulf is so narrow that passage by ship could be interdicted by land forces moving to the Bandar Abbas area. We should make plans now to fight without Middle East oil and should take the steps necessary to develop adequate alternative sources in Canada, Mexico and elsewhere.

Mr. Matthews: But we are agreed that MEDO should be established and that the Arabs should be included in the organization. If we bring them in, we must do something to convince them that we are interested in their defense.

General Bradley: As I see it, the MEDO objectives will be largely political. From the military point of view, it would be enormously easier to hold the inner ring which would involve pulling back to the Malatya Pass and maintaining a line Southward parallel to the Mediterranean Coast. . . .

Mr. Nitze: Wouldn't the air requirements be as great for the inner ring as the outer ring?

General Bradley: The requirements for support aviation would certainly be less.

Mr. Byroade: If we get Congressional authority in line with the State-Defense request for Middle East military funds, should we begin to shoot next year at meeting 1955 requirements?

General Bradley: Anything we do on the basis of the authority requested will necessarily be of a token character. The funds involved will not permit anything larger. Actually, before we start any large-scale effort to build up indigenous forces I think we would want more evidence of the willingness of the Middle East states to cooperate. We will want to have the Middle East Defense Organization a going concern. This would parallel NATO development, where the organization was established and the foundation laid before any substantial programs were begun.

Mr. Bissell: In the table of force contributions by 1955, only certain Middle East states are included. Why are Egypt and Syria, for example, omitted?

General Bradley: You must remember this is a UK estimate. Possibly the British expected to secure smaller units from Syria, Egypt and Saudi Arabia. One of the factors considered was certainly the difficulties of the supply situation.

General Collins: You have got to remember there is only one railroad line on the outer ring and, properly speaking, only one road. There is no provision in this estimate for logistical support and the whole thing is constructed on the most optimistic assumptions possible. For example, Iraq and Jordanian divisions are equated with those of the UK and Turkey.

Mr. Bissell: If we decided to support more air forces in the area, what would be the best way? Should we attempt to build up indigenous forces as in Turkey?

General Bradley: If we move forward with the MEDO and plan in terms of a forward line we must count on the use of some indigenous forces.

General Vandenberg: Air strength for the area must be US and Turkey. We might be able to teach the nationals of some of the other states to fly but to teach proper maintenance of equipment would be impossible inside of 4 or 5 years. The Turks, on the other hand, have made considerable progress in learning to maintain equipment.

Mr. Nitze: Should we try to do anything about building up air fields in the area?

General Vanderberg: We should always bear in mind the danger involved in constructing air fields in areas which we are unable to defend. They are easy to capture and to operate and unless we have air units to defend them we will be making a present to the enemy.

General Collins: To hold air fields you have got to have ground forces and anti-aircraft. There is no use to build up air fields unless you provide for their defense.

Mr. Nitze: What about air fields for the defense of the Suez?

General Vandenberg: There is already in Egypt and the Mediterranean littoral a fair complex of fields which could be used by modern aircraft.

General Collins: We have talked about the difficulties involved in our attempt to hold the outer ring. By the same token it would be very difficult for Russia to support forces for an attack on the Canal.

General Bradley: Some think it would be impossible for the Russians to launch a substantial attack on the Canal until they captured some Mediterranean ports and moved down the coast.

Telegram 2610 from Paris, October 28, not printed, reported that on October 25 the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs had delivered to the Embassy a reply to the Department of State aide-mémoire of October 14. (Regarding this aide-mémoire, see telegram 2155 to Paris, Document 94.) The final paragraph of the telegram reads: "I believe general atmosphere in Fon Off among those concerned with MEDO would be greatly improved if Dept would agree, as proposed by French, to discussions with representatives Brit and Fr Embs Washington on subject of liaison between NATO and MEDO. If Dept's reply to French proposal re liaison mission is favorable and can be given quickly these discussions perhaps unnecessary. However, if Dept's reply is protracted or is unfavorable, I think it would be great mistake not to agree to trilateral or bilateral discussions." (780.5/10-2852)

Telegram 2611 from Paris, October 28, not printed, transmitted a free translation of the text of the French reply dated October 25. (780.5/10-2852) Despatch 988 from Paris, November 3, enclosed a copy of the French reply and a translation. (780.5/11-352) The French Note stated that since it appeared the opinion of the United States Government was somewhat different from that of the French Government on the question of the liaison to be established between the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Middle East Defense Organization, the French Government persisted in its belief that tripartite conversations could facilitate agreement on the subject.

The French reply added that the French Government considered it unnecessary, at least in the planning stage, to place the Middle East Defense Organization under the authority of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Standing Group, since the planning group of the Middle East Defense Organization should be responsible only to the member governments of the organization through its military committee. The French considered it essential, however, that the Standing Group should be able to make known its suggestions or objections in the field of objectives and distribution of men and matériel between NATO and MEDO. For this reason, the French suggested the best method would be for the Standing Group to attach a liaison mission to MEDO for the purpose of constant liaison between the two organizations. They also suggested that the Turkish military representative in Washington participate in the deliberations of the Standing Group when it examined questions relating to the Middle East Defense Organization.

Telegram 2775 to Paris, November 13, not printed, informed the Embassy that "although Fr proposal for ultimate formal authority of SG in MEDO and for SG liaison Mission to MEDO Planning Grp in prelim phase unacceptable, Dept hopeful may be possible work out some interim liaison arrangement which will prove acceptable FonOff." (780.5/11-1052) The United States reply to the French Note was transmitted to the Embassy in Paris in telegram 3184, December 4, infra.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in France [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, December 4, 1952—5:21 p. m.

3184. Embtel 2611. Fol reply to Fr note of Oct 25 [2] re MEDO shld be presented FonOff by Emb: [3]

US Govt pleased its recent exchange of views with Fr Govt concerning relations proposed MEDO with NATO has shown two govts to be in full agreement as to importance of assuring that work of MEDO Planning Group shld be conducted with proper regard for NATO strategic objectives and plans. This govt also pleased at progress made in bringing together views of the two govts as to arrangements for serving this objective.

US Govt regrets however it is unable accept proposal put forward by Fr Govt in its aide-mémoire of Oct 25, 1952 for establishment of formal liaison mission to represent NATO Standing Group at headquarters of MEDO Planning Group. US Govt considers that this proposal is open to the fol objections:

A. Estab of a Standing Group liaison mission in manner proposed wld require approval of North Atlantic Council and might be cause of concern to some member govts. Creation of such a mission wld emphasize Western aspects of MEDO and might make more difficult task of negotiating with Arab States for their entry into org. At the least, it might well justify Arab States in demanding similar mission to represent Arab League.

B. Proposal to add Turkish representation to Standing Group when that body considered MEDO matters wld have effect of destroying principle of three-power Standing Group to which US Govt attaches greatest importance.[4] If Turkish representation were added to Standing Group for ME matters it wld be difficult reject requests of other NATO members for representation when matters of particular concern to them considered. It is recognized that this proposal was made in deference US views as to importance including Turkey in any MEDO directing organ, but MEDO arrangements shld not be allowed impair NATO structure.

C. Since MEDO Planning Group is body out of which Command org for ME is expected evolve, any liaison arrangements with NATO required in early stages of MEDO's development shld properly be made with corresponding NATO bodies—i.e., the Eur Command, or appropriate subordinate commands, and not with Standing Group which provides guidance and direction to SACEUR. As US, UK and Fr tentatively agreed at Rome Nov 1951,[5] such liaison arrangements can best be worked out after MEDO is established.

D. It is recognized that liaison arrangements of character described in C above wld not result in bringing to bear on work of MEDO Planning Group the informed knowledge of NATO strategic objectives and plans which both US Govt and Fr Govt consider essential. In view this govt however this objective can best be served, not by means of intermediary organ for transmitting communications between NATO Standing Group and MEDO Planning Group, but by placing MEDO Planning Group reps of US, Fr, UK and Turkey in position to receive authoritative guidance on NATO objectives and plans from their govts.

In its aide-memoire of Oct 14, 1952,[6] US Govt proposed that arrangement shld be made outside formal MEDO and NATO orgs and without formal status, whereby mil reps of US, Fr, UK and Turk might coordinate their views on appropriate MEDO matters and communicate these views to reps of the four powers on MEDO Planning Group. US Govt hopeful that fuller explanation of this proposed arrangement set forth below will persuade Fr Govt that objective of effectively coordinating the work of MEDO during its prelim phase with that of NATO can be accomplished by this means.

The arrangement envisaged by US Govt wld be informal and flexible. Each of four govts mentioned above wld designate a mil officer to represent it at discussions to be conducted in Washington at such intervals as appeared desirable. The object of these discussions wld be develop a coordinated four-power view on problems of major concern to MEDO Planning Group. Adequate coordination with NATO wld be assured by each govt designating as its rep an officer thoroughly conversant NATO plans and objectives, and, in case of US, France and UK, with work of Standing Group. As indicated above, US Govt considers it important avoid identification of proposed group with NATO Standing Group, and US rep in these discussions wld probably be officer not directly assigned to Standing Group or Standing Group Staff.

[6] See telegram 2155 to Paris, Document 94.

As to methods of operation, group might be apprised of problem on initiative of any one of four member govts. Issues on which reps of four govts on MEDO Planning Group required guidance cld be formulated by them and forwarded to one or all of four country reps in Washington through governmental channels. Coordinated views developed in four-power discussions cld be transmitted to each of country reps on MEDO Planning Group through same channels. By this means, it wld be possible supply MEDO Planning Group with continuing advice informed by thorough knowledge of NATO plans and objectives. NATO Standing Group, correspondingly, cld be kept currently informed of MEDO developments and wld be in position to cause consideration of a problem by ad hoc group if it appeared desirable.

As US Govt stated in its note of Oct 14, 1952 more formal arrangements will no doubt be required as MEDO develops. However, this govt unable give assurances concerning ultimate form of these arrangements which Fr Govt requested in aide-mémoire of Oct. 25, 1952. As stated in aide-mémoire of Oct 14 referred to above, Standing Group paper "Command in the Medit and ME" (S.G. 80/4)[7] was prelim study. It was of illustrative character, outlining an org into which Greece and Turk "might fit," and was presented to mil reps "for info". MEDO arrangements since agreed to have in several instances been markedly at variance with those suggested Standing Group study. This Govt has no record of having made any commitment at Ottawa, or elsewhere, on basis doc S.G.80/4 to extend auth of Standing Group to ME. Moreover, for reasons set forth in aide-mémoire of Oct 14, 1952, US Govt wld consider it unwise attempt at this time fix structure of Command org which may ultimately be developed.

Dept is prepared discuss arrangements proposed above with reps of Fr Govt in Washington if the Fr Govt shld so desire. US Govt will also be prepared at an appropriate time discuss with Fr, UK and Turk Govts problems involved implementing these proposals. In view this govt, such discussions might best take place after initial approach to Arab States has been made.[8]

Editorial Note

The Secretary of State was engaged in ministerial level talks with British Foreign Secretary Eden and French Foreign Minister Schuman at the Seventh Regular Session of the United Nations General Assembly in New York in November, and at the North Atlantic Council meeting in Paris in December. Nothing significant developed in either case in respect to the MEDO situation. Two position papers were drafted for Acheson for the New York meeting: document NYT D-2, November 8, 1952, "Egypt and MEDO," and document NYT D-4/3a, November 11, 1952, "Liaison between NATO and MEDO." (Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 134) One paper was drafted for the NAC meeting: document PBT D-1/6, December 10, 1952, "Egypt." (Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 129)

In addition, at the General Assembly session, Acheson spoke with a number of Foreign Ministers of the Middle East area, who were in New York for the session. Those conversations consisted mostly of exchanges of amenities, although there was some discussion of the Palestine problem and the question of Tunisia, which was on the agenda for discussion at that session. The memoranda of these conversations are in Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 132 and CF 133.

The Ambassador in the United Kingdom (Gifford) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET LONDON, December 31, 1952—7 p. m.

3605. Following is abbreviated text United Kingdom paper re Egyptian participation MEDO and enclosure handed to Byroade at United States-United Kingdom talks Egypt today. [2] Department's and Cairo's comments requested for meeting Saturday morning:

[1] Repeated to Cairo.

[2] For additional documentation on U.S.-U.K. talks on Egypt, held in London from Dec. 31, 1952 to Jan. 7, 1953, see Documents 947 ff.

A. Memo on Egyptian participation in MEDO.

1. Egyptian agreement participate MEDO essential part "package proposal". Timetable contemplate is that, soon Egyptian acceptance participation MEDO signified as part of negotiations over "package proposal", MEDO (with participation Egyptian officers) should be set up forthwith, and approaches should simultaneously be made other Arab states (if possible with Egyptian support) and Pakistan with view their participation in MEDO. Nature, extent and willingness of Egyptian participation in joint defense of Middle East should thus become evident in practice well before completion process evacuating British troops from Egypt.

2. Outline MEDO in which Egyptians are to be asked participate contained enclosed memo, suitable as basis paper to be handed to Government of Egypt. This based on earlier United Kingdom memo and incorporates amendments suggested by other sponsoring powers.

B. Enclosure.

Defense of Middle East vital to free world and can be secured only by cooperation of all interested states. Establishment of MEDO would assist and support states willing join in defense of Middle East and develop capacity of each to play its proper role in defense area as whole against outside aggression. MEDO will not interfere in problems and disputes arising within area and in no way affects existing arrangement relating to such matters.

Membership of MEDO.

It is proposed that MEDO should consist, in addition to United Kingdom and Egypt, of Iraq, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Saudia Arabia, Yemen, United States, France, Turkey, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. Six last names states have already signified their intention to participate. It is hoped Egypt will join them and United Kingdom is encouraging above-mentioned Arab states to become members of organization. Once these states have formed organization, applications from other states to join organization will be decided in accordance with views of those states already composing it.

Functions of MEDO.

Function of organization will be provided centre of cooperative effort for defense purposes. Initially its tasks will be:

(a) Draw up plans for defense of Middle East.

(b) Plan for, and provide Middle East states with assistance in form of training and advice.

(c) Coordinate requests by Middle East states for arms and equipment.

(d) Make plans for operations in war of all forces allocated for defense of area in coordination with adjoining NATO commands in Mediterranean and Asia Minor.

(e) Reduce such deficiencies as exist at present in organization and capacity for defense of area.

Structure of organization.

Plans should be kept flexible and as small as is consistent with:

(a) Need for efficient planning;
(b) Participation of number of different countries;
(c) Smooth evolution into full command structure if and when participating states think this desirable.

Organization would consist of:

(a) Military representatives committee.
(b) Planning group.

Military representatives committee would consist of representatives of all states participating in organization. It would be responsible for general direction of planning group and would meet twice year, or more often if required.

The planning group.

Planning group will be integrated structure composed of officers supplied by the participating powers, under British chairman. Group would be divided into appropriate sections to handle operations, plans, intelligence, administration and logistics, training, coordination of requests for military aid and equipment, liaison with non-participating Middle East states, etc. [3]

CONDITIONS AND TRENDS IN THE MIDDLE EAST * AFFECTING US SECURITY

THE PROBLEM

To identify the major forces and trends in the area, to assess their origin, relative strength, and probable development, and to estimate their effect on the Western and Soviet positions in the area, in the absence of general war.

CONCLUSIONS

1. In addition to its objective of contributing to stability in the Middle East, the West has a specific and basic concern with the extensive oil resources and strategic location of the area. Denial of these assets to the West would constitute a serious setback to it in the struggle with the Soviet Bloc, even if the area did not come directly under Communist control.

2. Patterns of authority are being undermined by rising discontent among nearly all social groups. This discontent is finding expression in growing demands for elimination of foreign influence and for internal social, economic, and political reforms.

3. Attainment of stability is obstructed by the ineffectiveness of Middle Eastern governmental and political institutions, by inadequate development of economic resources, by Arab-Israeli hostility, and by inter-Arab rivalries.

4. The USSR will continue to encourage disorder and anti-Westernism and to exploit the substantial opportunities for creating friction among states of the area, between them and the West, and

All members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee concurred in this estimate on 8 January 1953."

* This estimate deals with Iran, Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Egypt, and the principalities of the Arabian Peninsula. Conditions in Turkey and Israel, and their relations with the West and the Soviet Bloc, differ in so many respects from those in the rest of the Middle East that they will be treated only insofar as they affect developments in the rest of the area. among the Western Powers. Soviet rulers may estimate that the area can be effectively denied to the West without being brought under direct Communist control and without forcing the USSR prematurely to accept full responsibility for supporting Communist regimes in the area.

5. Local Communist parties, except possibly in Iran, are not likely to develop the strength to seize and maintain control of Middle Eastern governments during the next few years. However, Communist influence will probably grow, the principal danger being that without formally assuming control Communists will exercise an increasing influence on non-Communist governments.

6. However, except for Iran, Middle Eastern states do not feel immediately threatened by the USSR and they fear that acceptance of Western support would lead to Western domination. In particular, the acceptance of US influence is seriously hampered by the Arab conviction that the US is responsible for maintaining the state of Israel, and by US association with the former colonial powers—the UK and France.

7. Although we do not believe that a breakdown of authority is imminent, except possibly in Iran, the over-all situation with respect to stability is deteriorating.

8. In the foregoing circumstances, governments will probably rely increasingly on their armed forces to retain power. Although such authoritarian regimes offer hope of arresting the drift toward disorder, they will be beset by many internal problems. They will also have to find a solution to the problem of establishing relations with the Western Powers which will be acceptable to nationalist aspirations at home, but which will permit them to obtain Western military and economic aid and advice.

DISCUSSION

Introduction

9. In addition to its objective of contributing to stability in the Middle East, the West has a specific and basic concern with the extensive oil resources and strategic location of the area. Denial of these assets to the West would constitute a serious setback to it in the struggle with the Soviet Bloc, even if the area did not come directly under Communist control.

10. The Middle Eastern states do not have the strength to stand alone in the modern world or the capacity to cope with their own internal problems. In past years, the presence of British and French power in the area contributed to stability, even though it also provided a focal point for nationalist opposition. Ineffective governments and inadequately developed resources still make outside support essential to Middle Eastern stability. Yet these states, jealous of their independence, fear that acceptance of Western support would lead to Western domination. The question, therefore, is whether a new relationship can be established between the Middle Eastern states and the West which will on the one hand mollify Middle East suspicions of the West, and on the other permit such Western advice and support as will enable Middle Eastern states to maintain internal conditions generally favorable to themselves as well as to Western interests.

Basic Forces

11. Patterns of authority are being undermined throughout the Middle East by rising discontent among nearly all social groups. The traditional ruling classes—landlords, tribal leaders, and wealthy merchants—while struggling to maintain their privileged positions, have shown little ability or disposition to solve growing social and economic problems. There has been a rapid growth of educated and semi-educated elements in the cities—students, government workers, professional classes, junior army officers, small businessmen—whose aspirations for improved economic and social status are frustrated. These elements are being aroused by agitators offering varied and often conflicting programs—religious fundamentalists preaching a return to true Islamic practice; secular reformers advocating such programs as land reform, the elimination of corruption, and the extension of democratic government; proponents of authoritarian rule along fascist lines; and finally, the Communists. Urban industrial workers are not yet numerous or well-organized, and the large peasant class is in general still politically passive. Both groups, however, are becoming more responsive to political agitation.

12. Each country is at a different stage of social change and political development. In Saudi Arabia and Yemen, where no political parties exist, the tribal monarchies are in firm control. In Jordan, political activity outside the court and tribal leadership is just beginning to take form, and is being fomented by educated elements from West Jordan. The old guard is still in control in Iraq, but the advocates of change are growing in strength. Although secular reformers are in control in Egypt and Syria, attainment of social and political stability is by no means assured. In Iran, the National Front's insistence upon pursuing an anti-British policy, regardless of the effect on the nation's economy, may lead to further political and economic disintegration from which only the Communists could profit.

13. Throughout the area, many proponents of change have a similar negative and emotional attitude. There is a general disposition to eliminate the powers that be, with little regard or thought for what comes after. The two basic forces that motivate the proponents of change are:

a. A desire to eliminate foreign influence. The Middle Eastern governments and people are basically suspicious of Western motives and tend to become increasingly nationalist and neutralist.

b. A growing demand for internal social, economic, and political reforms. Few of these reforms, however, have been cast as positive programs.

Obstacles to Stability

14. Attainment of stability is being blocked by a number of problems not capable of easy or quick solution. They include ineffectiveness of the instruments of government, serious economic problems, and rivalries among the states of the area.

15. Existing political institutions and governmental machinery are inadequate in the present situation. Many legal and political forms have been copied from the West, but have not been adapted to Middle Eastern needs. In addition, there is a shortage of trained personnel, and a tradition of responsibility and integrity in government is lacking. Governments are further handicapped by the facts that the formerly dominant class is inflexible and resistant to change and that the proponents of change frequently offer programs incapable of rapid or practical implementation. Any government efforts to execute reform programs encounter strong resistance from special interests.

16. Growing pressure for economic improvement adds to the problems facing Middle Eastern governments. Except for oil, the area has few economic resources. Egypt, Jordan, and Lebanon are overpopulated in relation to arable land and known resources. Although Syria, Iraq, and Iran have much land which could be brought under cultivation, development of this potential would require many years and large-scale investments. Government efforts to develop the resources of the area are handicapped by inefficient economic procedures, untrained personnel, and resistance to new methods.

17. Israel and the related Arab refugee problem constitute a major obstacle to stability in the Middle East. Arab hostility toward the new state and fear of Israeli intentions have aggravated the difficulties of the Arab states in tackling pressing internal problems, have burdened them with high military budgets, and have prevented the development of an expanded area economy. Although Syria has broken the solid Arab front against resettlement of Arab refugees (totalling 800,000) by signing an agreement with the UN for resettlement in Syria of 80,000 refugees, final solution of this problem is a long way off. No progress has been made toward solving other Arab-Israeli difficulties. The Arab states fear an Israeli attempt to conquer additional territory under the pressure of overpopulation and lack of economic resources, particularly water. Conversely, Israel fears that a growth of Arab strength will lead to a war of revenge.

18. The stability of the area is also weakened by rivalries among the Arab states. The Arab states have a common cultural and religious heritage which some religious political leaders have hoped to make the basis for area cooperation and unity. The psychological and political significance of this common heritage has been overshadowed in the recent past by petty dynastic quarrels, narrow nationalistic politics, religious differences, and differences of economic interest. These have made disunity a characteristic of the Middle East and have interfered with efforts to solve common problems. Effective leadership for the area as a whole has not been forthcoming. Egypt, which is regarded as the state most likely to provide such leadership, dominates the Arab League, but has had little success in achieving positive united action. Attempts by Turkey, Pakistan, and others to promote unity in the area have evoked little response.

Obstacles to US Influence in the Middle East

19. US association with Israel is a continuing irritant in US-Arab relations and the major obstacle to the acceptance of US influence in the Middle East. The Arab world is united in its belief that the US is primarily responsible for the establishment of Israel, which it interprets as an act of ruthless anti-Arab imperialism. Moreover, many Arabs believe that US partiality in the Arab-Israeli dispute is further demonstrated by US failure to press more vigorously for enforcement of UN decisions on Arab refugees, on delimitation of the borders of Israel, and on the internationalization of Jerusalem. The US faces the dilemma that Israel cannot survive without foreign aid and that US aid to Israel deepens Arab resentment against the US.

20. US alliance with the UK and France, the most important former colonial powers in the area, also arouses Arab distrust. Demands in French North Africa for greater independence are strongly supported in the Middle East. Most Middle Eastern countries will almost certainly remain determined to weaken if not abolish British influence and special privilege. On the other hand, the UK, for reasons of prestige as well as of economic and military security, feels that it cannot afford to relinquish its still substantial military and economic positions. US efforts to bring the two parties together run the risk of (a) encouraging each side to be less inclined toward compromise in the hope of eventual US backing; and (b) evoking charges of favoritism from both sides. Finally, a too rapid abandonment of British positions would leave a military vacuum which the US would have difficulty in filling, and which would accentuate insecurity and create further opportunities for Soviet or local Commuist exploitation.

21. The US is also handicapped by the fact that the Arabs do not feel immediately threatened by the Soviet Union or recognize an immediate personal stake in the East-West struggle. They are far more apprehensive of Israeli aggression, and they suspect that Western interest in the area's defense is merely a camouflage for strengthening Western influence at the expense of their independence.

Soviet Capabilities and Intentions in the Middle East

22. The USSR has so far carried on relatively small-scale overt political activity in the Middle East. Soviet rulers probably estimate that Western influence is declining, that economic and political deterioration will continue, and that the general situation will become steadily more favorable to the expansion of Communist influence. Soviet rulers may conclude that the area can be effectively denied to the West without being brought under direct Communist control and without forcing the USSR prematurely to accept full responsibility for supporting Communist regimes in the area. The USSR will continue to encourage extremism of many kinds, particularly anti-Western and nationalistic, and to utilize opportunities to embarrass the relations of the Western Powers with each other and with the states of the area. Conditions in the Middle East, particularly the Arab-Israeli dispute, offer the USSR many opportunities for increasing these activities and for winning Arab good will.

23. Although the Moscow-directed Communist Parties are small and illegal and are not now, except in Iran, a major political factor in the Middle East, Communism contributes to and profits from unrest in the area. The Communist program holds out a ready solution attractive to dissatisfied groups, particularly the educated class. The Communists can exploit the widespread hostility against the Western Powers and the ruling classes without too openly revealing Soviet imperialist motives and goals. Communist agitation among workers and peasants is increasing, and Communist influence is likely to grow as these groups become more insistent upon improving their lot. The principal dangers posed by the Communists are: (a) that they will infiltrate government and military services to the point of seriously interfering with the exercise of authority; (b) that progress toward reform and economic improvement will be so slow that radical groups will become discouraged and turn to Communism; and (c) that non-Communist groups particularly the nationalist and reformist elements, will become divided, Communist-infiltrated, or willing to cooperate with the Communists, to such an extent that small, disciplined Communist parties can exercise a decisive influence on governments of the area even without formally assuming control.

PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS

Political Developments in the Arab States

24. We do not believe that a breakdown of authority in the Arab states is an immediate danger. Their security forces, if given effective leadership, are capable of maintaining internal control. None of the Communist parties is likely during the next few years to develop the strength to take over the governments by peaceful means or by force. Nevertheless, the over-all situation with respect to stability is currently deteriorating.

25. In this situation, governments will probably rely increasingly on their armed forces to retain power. Military reformist regimes are already in power in Egypt and Syria, and further regimes of this type may emerge. Although such authoritarian regimes offer hope of arresting the drift toward disorder, they will be handicapped by their lack of experience in dealing with economic and social problems; by the difficulties of implementing reforms which produce quick and tangible benefits for the people; and by opposition from vested interests, extreme nationalists, Communists, and possibly religious fundamentalists. If they are to succeed, such regimes will have to provide the people with some prospect of participation. They will also have to find a solution to the problem of establishing relations with the Western Powers which will be acceptable to nationalist aspirations at home, but which will permit them to obtain Western military and economic aid and advice.

Political Developments in Iran †

26. Iran presents a more pressing problem than that existing in the other states of the area, owing in part to the proximity of the Soviet Union and the strength of the Tudeh Party, and in part to the more immediate danger of social, political, and fiscal breakdown. The longer present trends in Iran continue unchecked, the more difficult it will become to prevent a breakdown of government authority which would open the way for at least a gradual assumption of control by Tudeh. Although such a breakdown appears unlikely during 1953, the Iranian situation contains so many elements of instability that it might occur at any time. The loss of Iran to Communism would be blow to US and Western prestige and would increase the vulnerability of the remainder of the Middle East and of the Indian subcontinent.

Economic Developments

27. The Middle East's basic economic difficulties are not likely to be resolved in the foreseeable future. It is improbable that local action can correct the low and, in some places, declining standard of living, technological backwardness, and foreign trade problems. Middle Eastern foreign trade, except possibly that of Iran, will probably continue to be principally with the Western nations. The most important foreseeable economic developments will relate to oil and to foreign aid programs.

28. Anti-Westernism and nationalism are growing threats to Western oil interests in the Middle East. However, the Arab states are unlikely to attempt to nationalize their oil industries unless they become convinced that Iran is profiting more as a result of oil nationalization than they are under existing contracts. Saudi Arabia and the small Arabian principalities are generally aware of their inability to produce and market oil without the assistance of major Western oil companies. Nevertheless, the states of the area, particularly Iraq, may be expected to exert greater pressure for an increased share of the oil revenues, for a reduction in the privileged position of the Western oil companies, and for greater local participation in their management. Refusal of the Western oil companies to make some adjustments to these pressures would increase Arab hostility toward the West and might eventually lead to further nationalization of Middle Eastern oil resources.

29. Oil revenues are an important source of revenue for government operations and potentially a source of capital for economic development in the Middle East. The oil companies provide important technical and educational services. Although fear of losing oil revenues acts as a deterrent to the adoption of extreme anti-Western policies, such rational self-interest cannot be counted upon in the present emotional political climate in the Middle East.

30. As pressures increase for economic and social reform, the governments will be under increasing compulsion to turn to the West for assistance. The granting of such assistance may influence the evolution of the area and offer Middle Easterners hope of a solution to their social and economic problems. Nevertheless, there are formidable obstacles to a successful aid program in the Middle East. Western supervision of such aid will be handicapped by the sensitivity of the governments of the area to any signs of Western interference in local affairs. Demands for aid will probably be large and for projects which the nations of the area are not ready to use effectively; US refusal to meet these demands will create disappointment which may increase anti-US sentiment.

Military Developments

31. Middle East armed forces are incapable, individually or collectively, of effectively resisting attack by a major power. The availability and usefulness of manpower for military and military support purposes is limited by prevailing inefficient agricultural techniques, physical disabilities, a high rate of illiteracy, and lack of technical and mechanical training. None of the states of the Middle East has the resources or industrial base to support modern armed forces, and nearly all countries are already allocating disproportionately large shares of their resources for military purposes.

32. Accordingly, defense of the Middle East against Soviet Bloc aggression will ultimately depend on employment of Western armed forces. At present, local forces are not even capable of manning and maintaining adequate bases for quick and effective use by Western forces in the event of war. Efforts to strengthen Middle Eastern defenses against aggression are confronted by obstacles already noted. The Middle Eastern states, except Iran, do not feel immediately threatened by the USSR. They are apprehensive of a renewal of Western domination. Hence, there is a growing demand in most of the area for elimination of existing Western bases and removal even of existing Western military forces.

33. On the other hand, the emergence of regimes relying largely on the support of local armed forces will stimulate demands for Western assistance in the training and equipping of those forces. But here again, this opportunity for Western influence is limited by the deep Arab-Israeli antagonism. Any aid given to one side will arouse resentment in the other.

34. It is possible that the desire for military assistance will be strong enough to induce the Arab states to join with the Western Powers in a regional defense organization, particularly if Egypt should take the lead. The success of such an organization would depend largely upon the extent to which the states of the Middle East could be convinced that they were participating as equals with the Western Powers. Even so, it is unlikely that participation in such an organization would quickly lead the Arab states to agree to the stationing of more Western troops in the area or to the allocation of their own forces to a command organization. However, such an organization would provide a mechanism for coordinating Western military aid and advice to the Middle East states and for carrying out some preliminary defense planning. It might also have some beneficial political and psychological effect and would give the West an opportunity to reduce Middle East suspicions of Western "imperialist" designs. Such an organization is not likely to develop sufficient military strength in the Middle East during the next few years to cause the USSR to consider itself seriously threatened. Soviet rulers, however, would be particularly sensitive to any Western military moves in Iran.

2031. Ind Amb discussed Pak association with MEDO with Secy [2] pointing out if this happened it wld be seized upon by various antagonistic elements in India who wld use it attack both Ind Govt and US. He felt this wld in large measure destroy work of Amer Amb and himself in cementing Indo-Amer friendship.

Amb was told Pak had not been approached on question, that question ME defense org still very much in discussion stage, that what was originally thought of as command structure now being discussed as planning operation and that views had been put forward as to possible contribution to such planning Pak might make with other views of concern being expressed about effect on India. Point was made that ME was without defense and there shld be some defense planning; that difficulties stood in way such as Egyptian situation and Arab–Israel relations. It was hoped planning for ME cld go forward without further increasing complications.

Amb referred to stories in press re discussion this problem in Paris and this was denied. Amb also referred to press report that question being discussed in London and he as informed Dept did not know of such discussions.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 27, 1953.

Subject: Pakistan and MEDO.

Participants: Mr. Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary
His Excellency Sir Zafrulla Khan, Pakistan Foreign Minister
Mr. Donald D. Kennedy, SOA

Sir Zafrulla said that as both he and I knew no approach had been made to Pakistan as to its association in MEDO. He had worried considerably about internal reaction in Pakistan on this when and if the approach were made and believed that considerable education would be necessary to bring the country around to acceptance of the idea. The recent unfavorable publicity in India, however, had been producing the reaction in his country of "What business is it of India's?". It seemed that the educational process was already underway.

Sir Zafrulla then said that he would be returning to Karachi following the Geneva talks on Kashmir [1] and that the Prime Minister would want to know something on this subject. We knew Pakistan's shortcomings and capabilities. What would be Pakistan's obligations?

I said that no progress had been made in the MEDO proposal during the last few months. Egypt posed a difficult problem and there was really nothing we could talk about now. We expected, in any case, that the UK would take the lead at the appropriate time. Sir Zafrulla said he understood but wanted me to know that when the subject came up the US should be "in it" or else any proposal would be received rather coolly.

I added that the many problems involved in getting MEDO underway made for such complexity that it might well happen that we could not come out with the complete organization at one time. This led me to ask him entirely on a personal basis and without any preconception on my part which would be better from Pakistan's viewpoint: Should the attempt be made to bring Pakistan along with all other countries? Or should we wait until the organization had been established and its outlines and purposes become clearer to the rest of the world, including India? Sir Zafrulla said he could only express a personal view but he thought his government would prefer the matter to rest until we were completely ready to discuss it bilaterally and if this meant waiting until some later stage, he thought this would be agreeable to Pakistan.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, February 13, 1953—7:35 p. m.

1028. Following information regarding imminent US-UK discussions with Egyptians may be relayed to Turks after you have ascertained that British Ambassador has implemented instructions from his Foreign Office, copy of which enclosed with London's despatch #3347, January 23 (copy to Ankara). [2] If copy not yet received assume British Ambassador will make Foreign Office memorandum available to you.

Now that UK-Egyptian agreement has been reached on the Sudan, US and UK intend open negotiations with Egypt in endeavor to secure its association in arrangements for defense of Middle East on following basis: 1) phased withdrawal from Egypt of British forces; 2) retention of peacetime base in Canal Zone; 3) provisions for air defense of Egypt; 4) Egyptian participation in MEDO; and 5) UK and US military and economic assistance to Egypt.

Point 4) above, on which US and UK would negotiate on behalf of sponsoring powers, considered essential part of package deal in order to avoid vacuum in Middle East defense and to justify supply of arms to Egypt. Should Egyptians wish consult other Arab governments before agreeing in principle to participate in MEDO, US and UK would be prepared, on behalf of or in cooperation with sponsoring powers, to make prior approach to Arab governments in order to enable Egyptians to discuss position with them on basis that those governments will equally have opportunity to participate in organization.

Regarding enclosure London's despatch #3374 [3347], US has not yet agreed memorandum should be used as basis for initial MEDO approach. This Government feels strongly that tactics to be pursued should not be codified but that negotiations should, to an extent, be "played by ear."

The Ambassador in Egypt (Caffery) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET CAIRO, February 19, 1953—5 p. m.

1893. Pakistan Chargé called this morning on Embassy counselor. He said that 10 days ago he had had interview with Naguib. Latter had inquired what Pakistan attitude would be toward MEDO. Chargé replied that Pakistan favored MEDO in principle but because of its friendship for Arab states would prefer not to indicate its assent until Arabs themselves had finished bargaining with West powers. Pakistan felt that this attitude would strengthen bargaining position of Arab states.

Re Indian attitude Pakistan Chargé said that most certain way of swinging Pakistan opinion in favor of MEDO was Nehru's outcry against Pakistan entry into this defense system.

Naguib then told Chargé that India had been exerting pressure on Egypt remain neutral. Chargé told Prime Minister that since his revolution was middle class uprising and was clearly anti-Communist in nature it should be fairly obvious that Egypt had no choice but to align itself with other enemies of communism and that accordingly neutrality was out of question. He felt that Naguib agreed in this assessment.

Zafrullah Khan Pakistan Foreign Minister arrives tomorrow for 5-day official visit. No agenda has been set but Pakistan Embassy is certain Foreign Minister will discuss Kashmir, attitudes to be adopted toward MEDO, Indian pressure for neutrality, and possibly attitudes toward Federal Germany. Zafrullah Khan will also discuss nomination of Pakistan member to Governor General's Advisory Commission in Sudan. Pakistan Chargé very skillfully beat Panikkar to the draw in securing Egyptian acceptance of Pakistani on this commission in lieu of Indian.

Department may wish in its discretion to pass New Delhi.

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Missions [1]

RESTRICTED WASHINGTON, February 19, 1953—6:03 p. m.

At press conference afternoon Feb 18 Secretary referred to regional security org which we hope would include Arab States and Israel. In answer to question he stated Israel would be welcome in set up. [2] In event further press inquiries concerning matter fol statement will be made in clarification.

"Secretary intended indicate that in development of MEDO, Israel wld not be overlooked. In stating that Israel 'wld be welcome in the setup', Secretary had in mind that any regional defense planning in NE must of necessity include Israel's possible contribution and her strategic position at eastern end of Mediterranean. He would welcome conditions which wld enable Israel to become member, but this does not necessarily mean that Israel would initially become member."

If Mission receives inquiries from Govt on this point or if local press reaction makes initiative desirable, Mission shld explain Secretary's remarks in above sense.

In Arab capitals it may be desirable for Mission also to state that plans for MEDO as currently developed do not contemplate invitation to Israel become initial member org. Once org est question of additional membership will be for org members to decide.

"A correspondent stated that following the break off of diplomatic relations by the Soviet Union with Israel, there had been a number of reports about American relations with the Middle Eastern countries. He informed the Secretary that the Associated Press had reported that the State Department had decided to cold-shoulder Israel in an attempt to bring the Arab States into the Middle East Defense Command. He then asked the Secretary to clarify the situation. Mr. Dulles replied that he could say categorically that there was no policy of cold-shouldering—as the correspondent had put it—Israel.

"Asked whether there was more military aid going to be given to the Arab States, the Secretary said that that was a matter on which he could not say categorically yes or no. He explained that, as the correspondents knew, there had been discussion about the possible creation of a regional security organization which would include, we would hope, the Arab States and Israel. He said that it might connect up with NATO via Turkey and so forth and that that was all in the realm of discussion. He added that he assumed that if it were carried through and implemented it would involve some military assistance. Asked whether Israel would be included in that setup, Mr. Dulles answered that she would be welcomed in the setup." (Memorandum of Press and Radio News Conference, Wednesday, Feb. 18, 1953)

The Ambassador in Iraq (Berry) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET BAGHDAD, February 27, 1953—9 a. m.

1053. Because I had asked him directly and in strictest confidence Turk Chargé Umar informed me of recent official conversation re MEDO with Foreign Minister Suwaidi undertaken under instructions from Turk Foreign Office. Following was substance:

1. Turkish Chargé told Suwaidi MEDO would comprise (a) countries of Middle East; (b) countries bordering on Middle East; (c) countries which can contribute materially to defense of Middle East.

Immediate task of MEDO would be (a) to prepare a plan of defense and (b) to précise what is lacking in each participating country to carry out defense plan.

2. Turk Chargé said United Kingdom in favor establishing headquarters MEDO in Cyprus but Turkey of opinion that it should be located in Turkey and prepared offer its territory. Each country participating in organization should be 100 percent equal and in Turk view there must be able total abandonment of discrimination between "founders" and "participants" as contained original MEC proposals.

3. At end this presentation Tawfiq Pasha remarked "our ally and friend, the United Kingdom, has never explained MEDO to us so objectively and fully." He said his own thoughts had been in terms of an organization larger than just the Arab States, perhaps including Iran, Afghanistan, India, and Indonesia. Turk Chargé replied he not speaking of an Asian pact but rather a workable defense organization in which each participating country would have direct interest in and make direct contribution toward Middle East defense.

4. Tawfiq Pasha said not a single Arab Government could agree individually to enter into discussion on MEDO so poorly was MEDO received by the Arab public. It was necessary find camouflage and he felt best approach was study by Arab League.

5. Turk Chargé replied that United States and United Kingdom pushing Egypt forward as spearhead of MEDO but he wanted Tawfiq Pasha to understand Turkey opposes this policy of any grouping having Egypt as center. Turk felt MEDO should include Arab States, France, the United States and United Kingdom but could easily exclude Egypt while [which?] primarily an African rather than Middle East power. Turk most exposed and most interested in Middle East defense, whereas Egypt least exposed and least interested. Therefore, MEDO should be centered in Turkey with northern Arab States joining as full equals. Chargé said Lebanon was amenable to this approach, Saudi Arabia no problem and Iraq's interests similar to Turkey's. Great stumbling block was Syria which insisted on aligning its policy with Egypt.

Although I suggested he find an occasion to tell British and French colleagues of his talk with Tawfiq Pasha he said he was not planning divulge it to them. His instructions from Ankara were to speak to Iraq Foreign Minister. He had sent full report to Ankara where Turk Foreign Office would use own judgment about revealing it to others. He urged me use utmost discretion in reporting this information in order not compromise him either with United Kingdom and French colleagues or with his own Foreign Office.

I therefore urge recipients this telegram observe appropriate caution in using foregoing information in order protect source.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 4, 1953.

Subject: General

Participants: The President
Anthony Eden, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain
Ambassador Makins
Secretary Dulles

The meeting was essentially social and held in the living quarters of the White House. There was a general exchange of views with reference to the world situation, the effect of Stalin's death, and finally the discussion settled primarily on Middle Eastern matters.

Mr. Eden emphasized the importance of developing MEDO as a bulwark against possible deterioration of conditions in Iran. The President emphasized, in this connection, the importance of peace between Egypt and Israel without which MEDO would be rather meaningless. Mr. Eden agreed but felt that the first thing to do was to push through the Suez settlement and that Naguib could not make peace with Israel without first the prestige of getting the British out of the Suez.

Mr. Eden urged that we should promptly send a high-ranking general to begin the negotiations with Slim. The President suggested that if we did this, it might be in order to ask General Hull to go, but that President did not in any way commit the United States to participation in the initial phases of the negotiations.

The President suggested that the United States might have to exercise a freer hand with relation to Iran and the oil situation.

892. Re Deptel 891 March 6. [2] Department appreciative urtels 1032 February 22 [3] and 1050 February 26 [4] and despatch 596 Feb-

[1] Repeated as telegram 5910 to London, 4734 to Paris, 1763 to Cairo, 515 to Jidda, 506 to Damascus, 820 to Tel Aviv, 1114 to Ankara, and transmitted to Moscow by air pouch. Drafted by Funkhouser and cleared by GTI, EUR, S/P, NEA, BNA, RA, and S/S–CR.

[2] Not printed; it reported the Department of State was giving further study to the approach to MEDO through a protocol to the Arab Collective Security Pact. The "back door approach" would be considered as a substitute if Egypt was unable to accept the original MEDO draft. (780.5/3–0653)

[3] Not printed; it reported on a telegram being sent to London by the British Embassy in Baghdad, concerning the substance of a Feb. 19 conversation between the British Ambassador and the Premier of Iraq. Telegram 1032 reads, in part, summarizing the British Embassy telegram: "Nuri reiterated his idea that Middle East defense should be based on Arab collective security pact. He said a protocol could be added to the pact enabling non-Arab countries to become parties to it. Nuri said previous defense proposals sponsored by West had two defects, namely (a) a 'command' (sic) implied purely military arrangement without any covering political agreement; (b) Arab states, except for Egypt, would have had an inferior position." (641.87/2–2253)

[4] Not printed. It reads, in part: "Embassy suggests that Nuri's idea of relating a Middle East defense to the Arab collective security pact is being put forward by him in his belief that it is potentially acceptable to the Iraqi people in contrast to a western involved MEDO, against which Iraq opinion has been aroused. Further consideration by the Department might therefore be given to fuller utilization of Nuri's ideas in developing a defense plan, if only as insurance against failure of Anglo-Egyptian talks. Embassy further suggests that obstacle to the proper consideration and acceptance by Iraq of a MEDO is the continued lack of anything concrete which the government or the public can grasp. In the meantime, the field is left clear to those who, for political or ideological reasons, are conjuring up all the dangers and disadvantages which a Middle East Defense Organization could bring to Iraq." (641.87/2–2653)

ruary 24 [5] which suggest fuller US–UK consideration Nuri's idea working towards "a MEDO" through protocol to existing Arab Collective Security Pact. While Department did not see fit discuss this approach in London talks, Department has been opinion that joint development of "a MEDO" would not preclude an examination of such Arab state suggestions, particularly if "a MEDO" could be made more effective or more palatable and consequently implemented quicker by "going in the back door". At time when West is already heavily committed provide armaments in Far East war theaters and Europe to extent that few additional military commitments can be fulfilled for Middle East at an early date, there might well be advantages in giving Middle East participants at least psychological benefit of having word spread throughout area that Western powers are prepared join them in area defense rather than vice versa. These advantages might include:

(a) Preservation of fundamental MEDO objectives plus more willing cooperation from Arab states on common defense measures.

(b) "Diplomatic victory" for Middle East governments which might strengthen their domestic and international position to point where cooperation with West could be sold to public. Specifically this approach might more easily enable Naguib to buy UK Government's "package deal" on Suez. (Reference Embassy Cairo cables.[6])

(c) Concrete measure to implement "psychological objectives" of PSB program for Middle East as contained document D22 February 6, 1953. [7]

(d) Manifestation of Administration's "new approach" to Middle East as anxiously awaited in the area.

(e) Counter for Communist propaganda that MEDO is imperialistic scheme foisted on unwilling Arab states by West.

[7] Not printed. Document D22, Feb. 6, 1953, was a 35-page paper entitled "Psychological Strategy Program for the Middle East," which was approved by the Psychological Strategy Board at its 17th meeting on Jan. 15, 1953. The major psychological objectives stated in the paper were: to strengthen confidence in the integrity of the United States and its sincere friendship for the people of the area; to convince Middle Eastern leaders that their interests were identical with those of the free world, and that the only prospect for adequate defense of the Middle East lay in cooperation with the United States and its allies; to promote an awareness of the Soviet threat; to encourage progressive elements in the Middle East to advance programs for the improvement of economic and social conditions in their area; and to develop an attitude in the leaders and opinion-forming groups in the area that it would be to their advantage to take steps which would facilitate the resolution of international and intra-regional controversies which weakened the area. (780.5/2-653)

(f) Positive and possibly dramatic move in foreign affairs field for US domestic consumption, particularly if parallel "Security Pact" arrangements with Israel could be developed.

(g) Reversed tactical position whereby Arab Collective Security Pact rather than MEDO proposals become target of attention, criticism and consequent modification.

Disadvantages, while not yet fully explored, would include (1) implications re Israel and (2) ACSP language. However it may develop that any defense scheme would be faced with (1) and suggested protocol might allow West to subscribe only to those parts of (2) which might be acceptable.

Department would appreciate further field comments re this backdoor approach, particularly Embassy Cairo views as to whether discussions with Arab states along lines Baghdad Despatch 596 February 24 might dispel adverse popular impression of MEDO sufficiently to contribute to successful conclusion of British-Egyptian "package deal" on Suez. In making field recommendations it should be kept in mind that Department places in high priority necessity for obtaining psychological warfare by-products which may be perhaps more valuable than immediate military benefits from any defense organization. An essential result which must follow any tactical approach to the Middle East states on defense arrangements is, of course, continued Western interest in and access to Suez Base.

1107. Turkish Chargé Umar called last evening and informed me of Iraqi MEDO developments since our last conversations. He had again seen Foreign Minister and told him tht Turks in due course expected official response to Chargé's proposal. Chargé explained to me that proposal was for all practical purposes an invitation to Iraq to associate in setting up MEDO. Foreign Minister replied that he had studied Chargé's proposal; that a sub-commission had been established to examine it in detail; that sub-commission had already finished its work and submitted its report; that this report will go soon to the Council of Ministers with Regent likely participating. When Chargé pressed Foreign Minister for a hint as to line Iraqi Government would take, Minister replied that Iraq Government certainly would not be against proposal but cautioned "don't hurry us".

I took occasion to inform Turk of points made in Deptel 890.[2] I also told him that Foreign Minister in conversations with me recently had told me in general terms of his conversations with Chargé on MEDO, and that on basis of Foreign Minister's conversations with me I expected to speak tomorrow with British Ambassador upon subject. The Chargé agreed at once saying that this approach covered him and further that if British Ambassador, following my conversations, would take initiative and ask him about his conversations with Foreign Minister he would tell British Ambassador what he had told me of that conversation. Thus I believe we will have re-established in Baghdad the frankness between colleagues which is essential to the success of MEDO.

When I queried Chargé about his statement that Turkey is prepared to offer its territory as headquarters for MEDO he explained that defense of Middle East must be primary interest of the countries of Middle East. Setting up a MEDO headquarters in Cyprus, the territory in Middle East of a Western European power, of which possession is challenged by an Eastern people (Greece), would not give the impression of indigenous authenticity to the MEDO project that is essential to its success. He added that although it has never been suggested that headquarters be in Egypt, such a suggestion would be unacceptable to Turkey for reasons of area prestige as well as for reasons of the effective working of an authentic defense organization of Middle East countries. In his opinion Egypt might, as a part of Suez settlement, wring from British an agreement, if Egypt decided it was in its interest to be associated in MEDO, to have MEDO headquarters located in Egypt for the purpose of giving substance to Egypt's claim to leadership of Arab world. In such an event he felt Turkey would not agree to the arrangement. In short he said leader of Middle East defense and logically, therefore, the seat of its headquarters, could only be Turkey. When I suggested that many people thought of Turkey more as a European than a Near Eastern state he replied that Turkey is a bridge both approaches to which are of interest to Turk nation.

[2] Not printed; telegram 890 to Ankara, Mar. 6, was repeated to Ankara as telegram 1112 on the same date. The Department of State considered Turkish Foreign Office instructions to its ministers in Arab states regarding defense discussions somewhat disturbing, although it believed the Turkish approach to the Arab states might produce beneficial results. The Department expected the United Kingdom to oppose the Turkish approach in substance and also take the position that the Turks were "jumping the gun" as far as timing was concerned. It suggested the Ambassador inform the Turkish Charge that a fundamental part of present thinking regarding MEDO was that there would not be any discrimination between founders of the organization and participants. It also asked the Ambassador to point out to the Turks that since Egypt had the principal military base in the Middle East, it could not be considered as of secondary importance to Middle Eastern defense. (780.5/2-2753)

If Chargé's thinking is truly representative of his government, this would appear to give substance to several indications that Turkish Government at last has shifted from Kemalist attitude toward Arabs and is now looking to its position of prestige in Middle East world.

The Ambassador in Iraq (Berry) to the Department of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL BAGHDAD, March 22, 1953—11 a. m.

1158. Foreign Minister Tawfiq Al-Suwaidi asked me to call this morning. He said that recent conversations with Turkish Chargé (mytels 1053, 1107 and 1118)[2] had made Iraqis realize how very vulnerable their country was to a Soviet attack coming through Persia. Foreign Minister had discussed this situation with Cabinet with result Cabinet had decided to improve Iraqi defense as rapidly and completely as means permitted.

Currently Iraq had no external military responsibilities except those specified in Arab League treaty of mutual defense, the military clauses of which have not yet been implemented. Thus, until such time as these, and arrangements of mutual defense by Western powers, are completed Iraq is bound to supply its army with the means to meet situation. Therefore Iraq desired to commence forthwith in building up its army. Foreign Minister then outlined importance to Western world of Iraq both from viewpoint of resources and strategy and asked that US, with British, assess Iraqi needs to meet its obligations in defense of its own territory and Western world. Foreign Minister said that he would send Embassy written note[3] expressing these thoughts. He said he planned similar approach to British Ambassador today.

I told Foreign Minister that I would report this conversation and forward to Department by airpouch his note when received. I said that I understood that his intention in present conversation was to start us thinking upon matter. If that were correct I felt USG might inquire as to why Iraqis had not availed themselves of means suggested to them by my note November 12 informing Foreign Minister that Iraq had been declared eligible to receive military equipment from USG under provisions of 408E of MDS act.[4] As I had presented our note to acting Foreign Minister Baban I took occasion to repeat to Foreign Minister Tawfiq Al-Suwaidi remarks I made at time of presentation. Minister replied that Iraq Government expected to take advantage of this offer and that I could expect very soon an official reply from Iraq Government so stating.

[3] Infra.

I told him I was pleased with this information and also that Iraq Govt realized so thoroughly need to prepare against Commie aggression. I said it seemed to me appropriate that Iraq Government use its resources to meet needs since it did have considerable resources.

Foreign Minister commented that Iraq Government could maintain four complete divisions from its own resources but it would not arm and equip four divisions without jeopardizing its program for economic development. He added that if there were plenty of time he felt developing sound economy and building military strength could go forward together entirely with Iraqi means, but he doubted the wisdom in these times of slowing down building strong army to maintain planned economic development. Without economic development Communism would arise from within Iraq.

Foreign Minister confirmed to me Cabinet position on defense as reported in final paragraph mytel 1108.[5]

I am gratified that this government understands the Commie menace and is taking measures to meet it both at the present time internally and in the future at Iraqi frontiers. Furthermore, it begins to look as though this government is toying with the thought that participation in MEDO may be the approach to solution of their own defense problems.

Undated Memorandum From Iraqi Foreign Minister Tawfiq al-Suwaidi to the Ambassador in Iraq (Berry) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL BAGHDAD.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL FOR THE AMBASSADOR

Iraq realizes its duties toward the defense of its independence and of the territory within its boundaries. Iraq has no other responsibility except that embodied in the Treaty for Collective Security among the Arab countries, in force at the present time. [2]

Until such time as arrangements for the foresaid mutual defense of Arab countries are completed, Iraq regards it to be its duty to begin immediately to supply the necessary means which will enable its army to discharge its obligations for defense. It had drawn up the requisite plans to achieve this end. It has been found, however, that its need for arms, ammunition and equipment will exceed its material capacity and economic potential, and that the execution of such plan will hinder its constructive progress which is not less important than any military or defense activities to be carried out.

Had Article 43 of the United Nations Charter been successfully implemented and the International Police for the prevention of aggression established, the members of the United Nations would have not felt so strongly the dangers surrounding them at the present time. Iraq, therefore, in searching for the most suitable means to secure the numerous items required to complete its defense, must request these from one or more United Nations members. The safe-guarding of Iraq from aggression on its northern and eastern boundaries and the protection of its oil resources have become the concern of all the free world and a matter which cannot be treated lightly. Articles 51 and 52 of the United Nations Charter particularly recognize the need of all member states such as Iraq to unify their efforts with other countries of common interest in finding suitable means, including regional organization for common defense against external aggression.

Iraq's requirements in carrying out its duty as defender of its territories requires important quantities of arms, equipment and supplies. These cannot be achieved except through aid from the United States and Great Britain, as was done for Turkey when it was found that the interest of the free world required shouldering of the responsibilities and the expenditure of the requisite funds to assist Turkey carrying out its defense duties.

If Iraq is required to discharge similar obligations in defense of its independence and territories, it is essential that it be extended every help and assistance and provided with necessary arms, supplies and the means of training required by modern armies. The required funds can be assessed by military experts and should be considered as part of what must be spent for the defense of the free world and all its vital resources against aggression.

The Chargé in Iraq (Ireland) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET BAGHDAD, March 28, 1953—5 p. m.

1182. Minister of Defense Nuri Said has given me review of Iraq defense plans along similar lines as to British Ambassador (Embtel 1180). [2] He did not mention Anglo-Iraqi treaty, Arab secret pact nor Israel.

In re source of arms and equipment, his approach differed from that described by British Ambassador. Nuri emphasized to me his wish for best arms possible. If American tanks were better than British, he wanted them; similarly with planes, etc. Material should be placed in Middle East which would do job of "stopping the Russians".

Cost of expansion, over and above Iraq's contributions, had been estimated at least 60 million dinars over four years. Iraq expected put up cost barracks, airfields, clothing, locally procured equipment, starting with approximately 14 million in 1954 budget of about Iraqi dinars 40 million. Emphasized Iraq could not supply remainder without severely affecting its development program which, in view of our past encouragement, he felt sure we would not wish to see crippled.

Upon my suggestion that beginning might well be made on a reimbursable basis through 408 (e) he professed inability to understand why this necessary. Grant had been given to Turkey as far back as 1947. We had built roads, etc., but Iraq did not ask for these. What we had done for Turkey in military aid we could surely do for Iraq. Iraq could be performing valuable services for the west. "Would not the resistance of Iraq on the Iranian frontier", he inquired, "be of direct service to American interests in the Persian Gulf?" The defense of Ruwanduz and Halabja in the north, Khanazin and Basra would do just that. Iraqis might not be able to do the whole job alone, but they would give time for Allied forces to arrive.

[2] Not printed.

Apparent from conversation that one obstacle to signing 408 (e) is belief by Ministers that it would bind Iraq to pay United States for equipment entire expansion program, a commitment not acceptable politically and because of impact on development program.

He proposed three steps looking toward United Kingdom–United States assistance in expansion of Iraq's defense forces:

1. Visit in near future of Anglo-American experts to assess Iraq's military needs and costs involved.
2. A subsequent visit by financial experts to assess what total cost Iraq could and should pay toward its defense.
3. Implementation of plan through assistance from United States-United Kingdom based on these reports.

Organization of Defense in the Middle East—[FPT Agenda 2, item C][2]

Mr. Bidault opened the discussion on the Middle East by pointing out that in this area as in others the Western Powers should present a united force. Here this front was not only against the enemy but also vis-à-vis the Arab states in the area. The psychology of the countries in this area was to obtain the highest possible price for their cooperation. While France was generally on excellent terms with the individual states in this area, tensions had been created in the U.N. He characterized the Arab League as purely a propaganda agency.

With reference to the Suez,[3] Mr. Bidault said that no matter what type of arrangements were finally worked out, the presence of European powers in the Suez Canal area was needed. Some type of planning body should be established to organize the defense of the Canal. This defense organization should later be broadened to admit Greece and Italy. The freedom of transit through the Canal must be insured, and Egypt must be made to understand that this security requirement was a basic principle of the Western Powers, since otherwise a jugular vein of the free world could be severed. An Egyptian diplomat has recently made it known that Egypt would not look with disfavor upon a meeting of those countries which have signed the 1888 Agreement.

[2] Item A on the agenda was Korea, but Secretary Dulles and Foreign Minister Bidault agreed that since that topic had been discussed at the first plenary session there was no need for further discussion. Item B was a study of USSR policies following the death of Stalin. Brackets in the source text.

[3] On Mar. 18, Ambassador Bonnet had called at the Department of State to inform the Under Secretary of State of the great importance France placed on the question of freedom of transit through the Suez Canal. He stressed its importance to the war in Indochina and remarked that previous U.S. replies to French proposals for tripartite talks on the subject had not been helpful. (Memorandum of conversation, Mar. 18, 1953; Conference files, lot 59 D 95, CF 141)

Secretary Dulles replied that, before asking Mr. Byroade to answer certain of the points in detail, he would like to stress the great importance which the U.S. placed upon the need to maintain free transit through the Suez Canal, both in time of peace and during war, and of the importance of having a base available in the Canal area in time of need. Secretary Dulles pointed out that the U.K. planned to open discussions with Egypt about the status of the Suez and that the U.K. had suggested that the U.S. might take an active part in such discussions. The participation of the U.S. had, however, been declined by the Egyptians, and discussions were now planned solely between the U.K. and Egypt. It was hoped that the British would report on the progress of these discussions both to the U.S. and to France.

Replying to Mr. Bidault's request for united action in the Middle East, Mr. Byroade said that while the U.S. recognized the importance of complete cooperation between the U.S. and France, the U.S. found that in certain cases, for tactical purposes, better results could be achieved by not openly presenting a solid front on all issues. As to the Arab League, it had sometimes presented a problem to the U.S. in the past, but there was hope that the situation might improve because of the appointment of a new Secretary General and because of indications that the new Egyptian leadership in the area might lead to the League's adopting a more constructive policy.

With reference to the Suez Canal, Mr. Byroade said that while the U.S. had not opposed the principle of having the U.S., France and the U.K. discuss ways to insure that the waterway remain international, the U.S. did not feel that the present time was appropriate to begin such talks because of the possibility of press leaks to the Egyptians. It seemed preferable to have the British and Egyptians begin bilateral discussions with the hope that later it would be possible to get General Naguib to provide some assurance with regard to the international status of the Canal. While it would be best to await some progress in the British-Egyptian talks before beginning formal discussions, Mr. Byroade felt that, within the near future, it might be possible to begin consultation about the status of the Canal at a low level, thus reducing the possibility of leaks.

Mr. Byroade said that the problem of timing also came up in connection with the entrance of Greece and Italy into MEDO. In addition, a question of principle was involved. The U.S. conception of MEDO was that its membership should be limited to states in the area and those states from outside which could help in the common defense. Since it was felt that this concept would be changed by extending MEDO to Italy and Greece, the U.S. wished to delay its decision until some of the complications connected with MEDO were resolved.

Mr. Bidault answered that the establishment of a body to discuss the question of freedom of transit through the Suez could be done without great fanfare or publicity. The French Government was not thinking in terms of informing Egypt and was quite willing to begin discussion at whatever level the U.S. desired, including at the level of experts. However, it was important to decide this question as soon as possible so that, if the countries involved were taken by surprise, they would be able to act in concert. Secretary Dulles suggested that, if the opportunity arose, some members of the French delegation present in Washington might discuss with Mr. Byroade the possibility of setting up a future meeting of experts.

[Here follows discussion of Item D, Organization of Defense in the Balkans: Yugoslavia and Trieste; Item E, U.S. Policy in South America; and Item F, Status of American Forces in France and Morocco.]

The British Embassy to the Department of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL

IRAQ

Her Majesty's Government welcome the Iraqi approach insofar as it indicates an increasing realisation by Iraq of the need to strengthen her forces and to increase her contribution to the defence of the Middle East.

2. Her Majesty's Government have already, in conjunction with the Iraqis, prepared plans for increasing the size of their army, building up a modern air force and equipping their forces throughout. The proposed programme for the army has been divided into three phases:—

(a) Phase I covers the equipment of the first two Iraqi Divisions, a third "cadre" division, two training brigades and a mechanised force. This is practically complete.

[1] Handed on Apr. 22, 1953 to Deputy Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs Jernegan by Harold Beeley, British Counselor of Embassy.

(b) Phase II covers the re-equipment of the third Iraqi division, and the equipment of an armoured brigade and a motor brigade, and additional artillery units. General Robertson, during a recent visit to Iraq, gave renewed assurances that we would fulfil phase II within 4 years. (Provided that the Iraqis place the necessary orders, the equipment could be provided in 2 to 3 years).

(c) Phase III covers the equipment of a fourth infantry division after the completion of Phase II.

It is clear that the present Iraqi approach amounts to a request for assistance to speed up the programme outlined above. We should of course wish to continue to assist in directing the expansion of the Iraqi forces as already planned.

3. Her Majesty's Government suggest for the consideration of the United States Government and hope they will agree as follows:

(a) That we might both reply welcoming the Iraqis' desire to strengthen their own military forces, both for their own needs and as a contribution to the defence of Middle East. [2]

(b) There is no indication in the reports from Baghdad that the Iraqis have made up their minds about the political framework within which the defence of the Middle East is to be organised. They wish to wait and see what progress is made in the proposed Anglo-Egyptian negotiations before deciding their attitude towards the proposed Middle East Defence Organisation. In these circumstances there seems little to be gained by pursuing the idea of creating a new regional defence scheme under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. Her Majesty's Government consider that it is therefore in their interest, and that of their allies, for the present Anglo-Iraqi Treaty to remain in force. The Treaty gives to the United Kingdom, as the Western Power primarily concerned at present with Middle East Defence, the greatest extent of military facilities which Her Majesty's Government can expect from Iraq. It is important that the United Kingdom should retain these facilities until new arrangements are made, so that in the event of the Middle East becoming a major theatre of war these facilities (and in particular the air bases) would be at the disposal of the West from the outset. In the light of the above Her Majesty's Government feel that Middle East defence should be discussed with the Iraqis as far as possible on the military rather than the political plane, at any rate until the progress of negotiations with Egypt enables it to be seen more clearly how a regional defence organization can be set up.

(c) In the light of the paragraph (b) above, we should both make it clear to the Iraqis that we can only help them to build up their military strength as a means of defending the Middle East area as a whole from a possible Soviet attack. We should explain that the countries of the Middle East, either alone or in concert, will in our view be unable in the foreseeable future to defend the area without powerful support from the West. The Western Powers have so far considered that this support should be given through their cooperation with the states of the area in a common defence arrangement, and it is hoped that some such organisation may shortly be set up. Until such an organisation for defence of the Middle East becomes a reality, it will be unwise to tamper with existing defence arrangements.

(d) The United Kingdom should not be supplanted as the principal source for Iraq's arms and military equipment. The Iraqis are bound by the terms of the Anglo-Iraqi Treaty of 1930 to ensure that the equipment of their forces shall not differ in type from those of British forces. Moreover the Iraqi forces are equipped with British material and it would be militarily undesirable to introduce new patterns now. Her Majesty's Government would also wish to keep any drain of dollars from the sterling area pool to a minimum. (Please see in this connexion the aide-mémoire left with the State Department on the 7th November 1952.)[3]

(e) Her Majesty's Government doubt whether the expanding oil revenues of Iraq will on closer examination be found to be inadequate to meet the proposed programme of expansion in addition to existing development plans. Development is necessarily carried out gradually, and a planned expansion of the Iraqi army would take time. Present indications are that the Iraqi Development Board is not using all the revenue assigned to it. Even if it adheres to its planned programme, there would, if the Board continues as planned to receive 70% of estimated oil revenues, be a surplus for the years 1953 to 1956 in the region of 27m. pounds. It will in any case be necessary to assess the cost of the expansion proposed by the Iraqis before we can see how much, if any, assistance is required. For this purpose the services of the British military experts who are already in Iraq and working out the orders which the Iraqis need to place in this country to carry through Phase II of the re-equipment might be used.

Believe you should know we have recent intelligence reports which indicate Egyptians have no intention cooperating with West in Regional Defense Organization even if Suez question settled to their satisfaction. General impression conveyed these reports is that Egyptians planning adopt "neutral" attitude and while willing and eager receive Western assistance would refuse make any public or private commitments in return.

Realize this may be bargaining position but we are nevertheless concerned at apparent stiffening Egyptian attitude, especially since some of our information indicates intransigent views may be sincerely held by members inner-circle RCC and are not merely reactions to public opinion.

We also wonder whether protestations of desire for peace with Israel might not be simply window dressing to be disregarded once British evacuation achieved.

AN ALTERNATIVE APPROACH TO MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE ARRANGEMENTS

1. Recent statements of Arab leaders emphasizing the primary responsibility of the Arab states for the defense of the Near East and the fact that arrangements for such defense have already been provided in the Arab Collective Security Pact, taken in conjunction with the actual terms of the Arab Collective Security Pact itself, suggest that efforts to negotiate for the establishment of MEDO bilaterally with the individual Arab states and without reference to the ACSP may well prove unsuccessful.

2. Unless measures are taken to coordinate the two organizations, entry by the Arab states into MEDO would require their disregard of fundamental provisions of the ACSP amounting to a repudiation of the instrument. Article 10 of the ACSP provides that no signatory power shall enter into any international agreement which may be contradictory to the treaty. The Military Annex of the Pact provides that under the control of the Joint Defense Council a permanent military commission shall prepare military plans for the defense of the signatory states, organize the exchange of training missions, submit proposals to increase the effectiveness of forces, etc. Since the MEDO proposals would assign these functions to another body, organized under different authority, agreement by Arab states to enter MEDO would appear, prima facie, to constitute a violation of the ASCP as now drafted.

[2] Replies from the various Embassies are described in the editorial note, infra.

3. The Department of State is of the opinion that account must be taken of this problem and that an effort should be made to develop a solution which would at the same time satisfy the Arab leaders and preserve the essential objectives sought by the Western powers in sponsoring MEDO. From the point of view of the Western powers, what is required is an organization which would be adapted to the performance of the functions allotted to the Planning Group in the present MEDO proposals; which will be responsive to Western guidance; and which will make possible the eventual evolution of a command organization under Western leadership. For the United States, it is also essential that no formal treaty obligations be involved. Although it is impossible to predict with assurance what will be satisfactory from the point of view of the Arab states, recent statements by responsible leaders in Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon and Syria seem to indicate that the Governments of these states desire to cooperate with the Western powers in defense arrangements, provided such cooperation will bring them military aid and can be effected on a basis which will neither expose them to charges that they have capitulated to the West nor involve a loss of face for the Arab League.

4. In the the view of the Department of State, the suggestion of Iraqi leaders [3] that the West should cooperate with the Arab states by adhering to an amended version of the ACSP does not, for the following reasons, provide an acceptable solution to the problem: a) The ACSP is an integral part of the Arab League and its several organs are ultimately responsible to the Arab League Council; b) Adherence to the ACSP would involve sweeping commitments amounting to a full military alliance with the Arab states which the United States is not at present prepared to undertake; c) The Israeli Government and people are convinced that the ACSP is dedicated to the destruction of Israel; d) Even though the MEDO sponsoring powers were prepared to accede to the ACSP, it is doubtful that certain non-Arab Middle East states, such as Pakistan, which could make a significant contribution to area defense, would be willing to become parties to the treaty; e) The general character of the treaty and the organization it establishes would tend to prevent the development of a command organization on a workable basis. Theoretically, it might be possible to cure most of these faults by means of amendments to the ACSP. This operation, however, would involve a complete and radical revision of the commitments undertaken, the organization established and the functions performed under the present terms of the treaty. Proposals to this end could hardly be expected to induce Arab cooperation.

[3] See footnotes 3 and 4, Document 122.

5. In the view of the Department of State, a possible solution of the problem may lie in the marked similarity of the Military Annex of the ACSP to the MEDO concept as presently agreed by the sponsors. Whereas most of the provisions of the Treaty proper are fundamentally unacceptable, the Military Annex establishes organs for military planning and prescribes functions which are closely similar to the structure and functions of MEDO as agreed by the sponsors. Annex A, attached, sets forth a comparative analysis of the Military Annex of ACSP and the draft MEDO document as presently agreed.

6. It seems to the Department of State that the Military Annex to the ACSP might be accepted by the MEDO sponsors as a basis for negotiating with the Arab states for the establishment of an inclusive Middle East planning group with similar functions, as part of an organization which might be called by some name other than the MEDO. It would be plausible to argue from the organization of the ACSP and the similarity of the functions of the broader Planning Group to those of the Military Commission that such a group should receive guidance and direction from a superior body composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the Arab and Western participating states. These proposals relate only to tactics and do not affect the substance of the proposals on which agreement has been reached among the MEDO sponsors. The Organization these proposals are intended to produce would in all essentials be identical with that proposed in the MEDO draft. Like MEDO, it would exist alongside but separate from the ACSP, with its own lines of organizational authority distinct from those of the Arab League organs. No formal link between the two organizations is proposed, though for tactical reasons it might be desirable in the terms of reference of the new organization to make some complimentary reference to the ACSP.

7. In the view of the Department of State, there would be certain definite advantages to be derived if the sponsoring powers were to propose to the Arab states that the Military Annex of the ACSP rather than the MEDO draft be made the basis of negotiation with respect to the functions of the broader planning group. Such a proposal would at the outset make suitable acknowledgment of the ACSP and of the Arab initiative in establishing it, while avoiding the suspicion which a Western draft would inevitably arouse, and would simplify the task of the Arab leaders in making the adherence of the Arab States to the new organization appear consistent with the ACSP. However, for maximum effectiveness, the proposal should appear to originate on the Arab side. The Department is requesting the advice of United States Missions in the Arab capitals as to the possibility of stimulating certain of the Arab leaders to produce the proposal as their own.

8. From the Arab point of view, even though the above procedures were followed, some conflict between the inclusive organization and the ACSP might still remain. However, the above steps would point the direction of a complete solution which the Arabs themselves might effect by an amendment to the ACSP authorizing member states to participate in other organizations which had common objectives with the ACSP and which would assist the Arab states in perfecting defense arrangements in the Near East.

9. The foregoing proposals, designed to appeal to the Arab states, would doubtless increase the apprehensions of Israel which have already been strongly voiced in response to reports concerning MEDO plans. The Department of State is convinced that the adoption of such an approach to the Arab states would make imperative a parallel approach to Israel. In this approach it would be desirable to emphasize the following points: a) The MEDO sponsors have changed neither their objectives nor their concept of the type of defense organization they are prepared to support in the Middle East, and the acceptance of the Military Annex of the ACSP as a basis for negotiation with the Arab States, rather than proposals the sponsors might themselves put forward, will not be permitted to affect the interests of Israel adversely; b) The new organization will be separate from the Arab League and will in no way lend itself to Arab pressure on Israel. On the contrary, it will be directed exclusively at developing defenses against aggression from outside the area. To the extent the organization is successful, it should contribute to the atrophy of the ACSP; c) A renewal of hostilities within the Near East area must be avoided, and this consideration will continue to govern the signatories of the Tripartite Declaration in supplying arms assistance to the Arab states and Israel. d) The sponsoring powers are convinced that Israel can contribute significantly to Middle East defense, and it will be an objective of their policy to promote conditions which will make it possible for Israel to become a full member of the regional defense organization. The use of the ACSP Military Annex as a basis for the initial negotiations should not increase the difficulty of later membership for Israel, since the new organization would be separate from ACSP.

10. The Department of State suggests that the above and any other proposals for dealing with the problems posed by the ACSP and Arab resistance to MEDO should be considered urgently with a view to developing an alternative approach to the establishment of inclusive defense arrangements in the Middle East. Decisions concerning the use of such possible alternatives would, of course, have to be made in the light of the developing situation in the Middle East, and perhaps particularly in Egypt. Prior agreement on such alternatives will be necessary, however, to enable negotiators to move rapidly when and if the situation warrants.

The parallel functions of the two bodies are indicated by the following presentation:

MEDO Planning Group | ACSP Permanent Military Commission

FUNCTIONS

a. Draw up plans for the defense of the Middle East; make plans for the operations in war of all forces allocated to the defense of the area.	a. Prepare plans against armed aggression. Study various facilities and aids which each state should provide.

b. Provide Middle East States training and advice; reduce such deficiencies as exist in the organization and capacity for defense of the area; coordinate requests of Middle East States for arms and equipment.	b. Submit proposals for arming, organization and training, to increase efficiency of armed forces; organize exchange of training missions; propose organization and size of forces of each state; prepare data and statistics concerning resources and military potential of each State.

Differences

	c. Prepare plans for joint exercises and maneuvers and carry them out.
	d. Submit proposals for economic development to promote defense effort.

Editorial Note

The Embassy in Jordan sent the only reply suggesting agreement with the Turkish proposals for going along with a defense organization without the Arabs. Telegram 1006 from Amman, May 27, did not consider the proposal advanced in the airgram of May 1, supra, likely to be acceptable to Jordan, and believed the only way to achieve a Middle East Defense Organization was to establish it without Arab support, giving the Arab States the right to join later. The Embassy was not unduly concerned with the dangers of confronting the Arab States with a fait accompli since it considered the danger to lie in showing weakness rather than strength.

Telegram 2059 from Beirut, May 26, commented that the Embassy was firmly convinced a collective defense organization with Western participation was essential to overcome the security vacuum in the Middle East, but considered the political climate unpropitious, and in fact suggested that a connection between United States defense thinking and the Arab pact might destroy the Arab collective security effort. The Embassy felt that all regional defense proposals should be held up until the return of the Secretary of State and a reexamination of United States Near East policies. Positive steps to resolve the situations in Palestine and Egypt might improve the political climate in the area; and military aid, especially to Egypt and Syria, might provide an opening wedge for a successful regional defense organization.

Telegram 2439 from Cairo, May 15, advised the Department of State that since General Naguib and others had mentioned to the Secretary of State the possibility of using the Arab Collective Security Pact as a foundation for regional defense arrangements. Egypt would probably react favorably to the military annex alternative to the Middle East Defense Organization if the evacuation issue were settled to the satisfaction of the Egyptians. The Embassy believed the suggestion should be pursued cautiously, but saw no objection to planting the idea with appropriate friendly Arab leaders without delay.

The Embassy in Jidda, in telegrams 877, May 16, considered the suggestion for working through the Arab organization an excellent one, as it might help to remove local suspicions that a Middle East Defense Organization might be an instrument for the reimposition of British and French hegemony in the Middle East.

The Embassy in Baghdad replied on May 26, in telegram 1410, that it doubted any area-wide Middle East Defense Organization would be practicable until the Suez problem was satisfactorily resolved. It was attracted to the idea set forth in the May 1 airgram, since it believed an indigenous basis for a defense organization was probably a necessity for success, but suggested waiting until the Suez problem was settled before trying to stimulate any Arab leader to make a proposal on a regional defense organization.

The Embassy in Damascus wrote that the Department of State's alternative approach of the May 1 airgram might appeal to Shishikli, especially if the United States offered substantial aid, if progress were made toward the settlement of the Palestine and Suez questions, and if he saw impartial treatment by the United States of both Israel and the Arab States. The Embassy adhered to the view that defense arrangements in the Middle East must not only include the Arab States but must also provide a basis for dealing with area problems in a spirit of mutual confidence.

The above telegrams are in Department of State file 780.5.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of Egypt and Anglo-Egyptian Sudan Affairs (Burdett)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 4, 1953.

Subject: Call of Egyptian Ambassador

Participants: Dr. Ahmed Hussein, Egyptian Ambassador Designate
NEA—Mr. Byroade
NE—Mr. Burdett

The Egyptian Ambassador Designate called on Mr. Byroade for a discussion of the current talks with the U.K. and Middle East defense. The Ambassador stated he held a five-hour conference with General Naguib and leading members of the Revolutionary Command Council immediately before departing from Cairo, and since has had several telephone conversations with his Government. He intends to leave for Cairo May 7 and will report on his discussions with U.S. officials.

Dr. Hussein made the following points:

1. The Naguib Government has the support of the overwhelming majority of the Egyptian people. Opponents consist only of communists and disgruntled landlords. There is no possible alternative. Only the Army is capable of effecting a change and another coup would lead to a series of unstable military governments. General Naguib is now accused of taking too conciliatory a stand in his relations with the West and of being pro-American.

2. MEDO or a similar organization is completely unacceptable to Egypt. General Naguib instructed him to stress the above point. MEDO was originally presented at a bad psychological moment. The Revolutionary Command Council cannot afford to appear before the Egyptian public less intent on achieving Egypt's national aspirations than previous governments. The Revolutionary Command Council is convinced that acceptance of any type of MEDO would be "suicide". Any arrangement replacing British forces by those of other Western countries would be merely a continuation of occupation in another form.

3. Egypt hates communism and realizes it would never be attacked by the West. In its own self interest it would resist any aggression on its territory. Egypt would welcome assistance from the West in building up its military strength to increase its defense capabilities.

4. Arrangement on the following lines could be worked out:

a. Unconditional evacuation of the Suez Canal Zone Base.

b. Immediate talks concerning Middle East defense involving building up the strength of the area both militarily and economically.

c. Defense of the area to be based on the Arab League Collective Security Pact.

d. The Western Powers to be linked to this Pact through the British treaties with Iraq, Jordan and Libya and through the U.S. "treaty" with Saudi Arabia. (Really air base agreement.)

e. No additional direct defense commitments between the Western Powers and Arab States.

5. By adopting this procedure, the West would gain the good will of Egypt and through Egypt the good will of the other Arab States. The British forces in the Suez Canal would be replaced by a much larger Egyptian contingent, equipped and trained to assume responsibility for defense of the area. No formal defense arrangement is necessary since in its own interest Egypt is bound to cooperate against the only possible aggressor. The present Canal Zone Base is not usable while surrounded by a hostile population. The only approach for the West is to have confidence in Egypt, and, after the evacuation of British forces, to build up local defense forces without requiring firm commitments. Reliance should be placed on the statements of General Naguib and the self interests of Egypt in defending its own territory.

6. The discussions with the British are not going well. Although before the start of the talks, the U.K. accepted evacuation, it is now unwilling to agree in principle to methods of carrying this out. Egypt considers such agreement essential, before referring the different issues to sub-committees.

7. Egypt is most grateful for U.S. assistance in solving the Sudan problem. She intends to keep the discussions in Cairo going until the Secretary arrives, confident that he will accord Egypt the necessary support to assure their successful conclusion in accordance with the formula outlined under 4 above.

8. He will telephone Lt. Colonel Abdel Nasir after the meeting scheduled for May 5 to report this conversation stressing Mr. Byroade's views on:

a. The importance of referring the questions under discussion with the U.K. to sub-committees immediately without attempting to obtain agreement in principle at this stage.

b. The importance of tangible defense commitments by the Arab States.

Mr. Byroade made the following observations:

1. The U.S. has the utmost faith in General Naguib, recognizes the leadership of Egypt in the Arab world, and the great desirability of assuring the willing cooperation of the peoples of the Arab States.

2. However, U.S. objectives in the Middle East are not dissimilar from those of the British, although it disagrees sometimes with respect to tactics.

3. Britain, as well as Egypt, has an acute public opinion question with which to contend. The agreement on the Sudan shook the Conservative Government and unconditional evacuation would be unacceptable to the British people.

4. The U.S. does not question that evacuation should take place, but believes the present situation should be replaced by some form of defense arrangement. It does not insist upon any specific type, such as MEDO.

5. The installations in the Canal Zone are of vital importance to the U.S., perhaps more so than to the British.

6. Without a definite defense commitment by Egypt and the other Arab States, it would be very difficult to justify to Congress the expenditure of funds for economic and military assistance.

7. During present discussions with the U.K. the issues should be referred to sub-committees instead of attempting to obtain agreement on principle at this stage. Once the practice questions involved are thoroughly understood, it should be easier to reach a meeting of minds on the broad question of principles.

8. Although this does not apply to General Naguib, himself, the U.S. has received lately disquieting reports that persons surrounding Naguib actually believe a policy of "neutrality" would best serve Egypt's interests. (The Ambassador denied this.)

Editorial Note

On January 29, 1953, the National Security Council, at its 129th meeting, with the President presiding, directed the Senior NSC Staff to develop an agenda of policy questions for consideration by the Council, to include those items desired by each Council member. (S/S-NSC files, lot 66 D 95, "Record of Actions by the National Security Council, 1953") That same afternoon the Senior NSC Staff drew up a list of policy questions requiring urgent or immediate consideration by the Council. Included on this list was NSC 129/1, "United States Objectives and Policies With Respect to the Arab States and Israel." (S/P-NSC files, lot 62 D 1, "1953, Record of Planning Board Meetings-NSC Files") NSC 129/1, April 24, 1952, is printed as Document 71.

The first drafts of a revision of NSC 129/1 found in Department of State files are dated April 12 and 14, 1953. They were considered at an April 15 meeting of the NSC Planning Board and an amended draft, dated April 24, was prepared. The Planning Board considered and amended the April 24 draft at a meeting on April 27 and directed the Board Assistants to prepare an amended version of that draft and a coordinated staff study for final reveiw by the Planning Board. An amended draft and a staff study, both dated May 4, were considered at the May 6 meeting of the Planning Board. At that meeting, the Board reviewed the May 4 draft and agreed that it should be made available to the Secretary of State for use as background information during his forthcoming visit to the Near East. It also agreed the Board should review the policy statement on the return of the Secretary of State in preparation for a report to the National Security Council. Records of the NSC Planning Board meetings are in S/P–NSC files, lot 62 D 1, "1953, Record of Planning Board Meetings". The draft revisions of NSC 129/1, including the May 4 text and Staff Study, are in S/P–NSC files, lot 61 D 167, "Near East (NSC 155)".

The President's Special Assistant (Cutler) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 6, 1953.

DEAR FOSTER: The NSC Planning Board has labored for many weeks to prepare for Council consideration the attached statement of policy on the Near East. [1] The Board believes, however, that the Council should not consider this report until you and Harold have returned from your trip, in order that the Board might profit from your firsthand impressions of the area.

Although it is not usual to send Council Members drafts of staff papers, I thought you might find it useful to take this draft with you on your forthcoming visit to the Near East.

The following points seem to me to call for closer scrutiny and clarification before the Council finally acts on a Near Eastern policy:

[1] The May 4 Draft Statement of Policy is not printed.

There was attached to the source text a memorandum from Byroade to Bowie, dated May 31, not printed. According to the memorandum, the May 4 Draft Statement of Policy and Staff Study were discussed with the Secretary of State on his Near Eastern trip. The memorandum reads, in part: "Time did not permit the working out of a detailed revision of the paper to correspond to our findings during the trip. Discussion of the substantive matters covered by the paper was extensive however and I believe the suggested revisions in the attached memorandum would closely correspond to his view. I shall endeavor to clear these exact changes with him [Dulles] personally as soon as time permits. If this does not prove possible prior to the next scheduled Planning Board meeting on this paper, I suggest tabling the proposed changes on the part of the Department. Such changes would, of course, be subject to his approval when he must of necessity consider the paper at a subsequent meeting of the Council itself." The memorandum mentioned by Byroade, entitled "Suggested Changes to Planning Board's Statement of Policy and Staff Study of May 4 on the Near East," undated, is not printed but is attached to this letter in the S/P–NSC files, lot 63 D 351, "NSC 155 Memoranda".

Two later draft statements of policy dated June 10 and June 17, are similar to the May 4 text. The June 17 text was considered and amended at the July 9 meeting of the National Security Council; see Document 144. The June 10 draft is in the S/P–NSC files, lot 61 D 167, "Near East (NSC 155)", and the June 17 draft is in the S/S–NSC files, lot 63 D 351, "NSC 155 Memoranda".

1. The degree of importance which the United States attaches to the area from the point of view of our security interest, having in mind the oil resources of the area or preventing these resources from falling into the hands of the enemy.
2. The kind of military assistance to be rendered and the objectives of such military assistance, both in "cold war" and in the event of armed conflict.
3. Alternatives for MEDO. Could the Arab League supply the basis for a practicable defense organization?
4. The possibility of a regional economic approach to the area by the United States, Britain, and France in view of the remote prospects of building viable economies in the individual states of the area.
5. Definition of our relationship with the U.K.

When you return, we hope for more light on these and other points which occur to you, in order to give the paper more meaning.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, June 1, 1953.

Subject: The Situation in Egypt and the Near East

---

[1] A handwritten note on the memorandum reads: "Sec saw 5 June. R[oderic] L. O'C[onnor]."

Participants: The President
Ahmed Abboud Pasha
The Egyptian Ambassador
Also present: John D. Jernegan, NEA
Thomas Stephens, The President's Appointment Secretary

The President did most of the talking during the half-hour conversation. He opened by inquiring as to the present economic situation in Egypt. Abboud Pasha replied that Egypt was suffering from an economic crisis, largely due to its inability to sell its cotton abroad. The President asked about possibilities of finding petroleum in Egypt, to which Abboud Pasha replied that prospects were excellent and that one of his reasons for being in the United States was to meet a Texas oil man to discuss this very question.

Abboud Pasha spoke briefly regarding Egypt's need for economic assistance. He emphasized the importance of Egypt in the Middle East, saying that it was, in fact, not only the most important country in the area but really the only important country in the area.

After further general discussion of economic matters affecting Egypt, the President commented at some length on the political situation in the Near East. The essence of his remarks was:

1. He was intensely interested in the area and his primary objective was to bring about peace between its states. He was thinking especially of the Arab-Israeli quarrel. It was essential that both sides stop quarrelling and that they respect the existing frontiers.
2. The US wanted to be friends with all nations in the Middle East, because we believed that only through friendship could the nations of the world unite against the Soviet danger which threatened us all. We intended to be fair to all the Near Eastern states and to show no favoritism. He knew it had been said that there were five or six million Jewish votes in the US and very few Moslem votes, but he was not running for office. He had been dragged into office but he could not be made to do anything he did not believe was right.
3. In addition to the Arab-Israeli problem, the other great problem in the area was that of the Suez Base. Here he believed both sides wanted a settlement and that a satisfactory arrangement would not be difficult to achieve if it were not for the excited public opinion on both sides. The leaders were unable to sit down quietly and reach a logical solution because, figuratively, someone was standing behind the back of each of them with a raised dagger.
4. The Soviet danger which hangs over all of us make us all more disposed to be conciliatory and to resolve our disputes. Unfortunately, it seemed to create a tension which made it more difficult to get together. Nevertheless, he believed a satisfactory solution was possible. He intended to work for it and he would not allow himself to be discouraged by the difficulties.
5. One of the reasons it was important for the states of the Near East to get along together was that their quarrels made it harder for the US Government to give them assistance. People in the US who opposed foreign aid programs could argue that it was useless to assist the Near East when the states of that region did nothing but fight among themselves. Despite all this, the President believed it was important to help the area and he would persevere in this policy.

6. The President assured the Ambassador and Abboud Pasha that we would do nothing and would undertake no commitment that would be "illogical" with regard to Egypt. Our objective was a reasonable solution to present difficulties.

During the course of the President's remarks, which were made informally and not in the exact order set forth above, Abboud Pasha interjected observations to the effect that (a) American policy toward Israel had created fear in the Arab states; (b) the US, nevertheless, was not regarded as an imperialist state; (c) the refugees were the real problem in the Palestine situation; and (d) one of the difficulties in the Anglo-Egyptian dispute was the inferiority complex which seventy years of British occupation had created in the Egyptians—if it were not for this, Egypt could admit British troops just as American troops were admitted to France and England.

At the close of the conversation, Ambassador Hussein told the President that Secretary Dulles' recent visit to Cairo had had an excellent effect and created much hope among the Egyptians.

Memorandum of Discussion at the 147th Meeting of the National Security Council, Monday, June 1, 1953 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

Present at the 147th meeting of the Council were the President of the United States, presiding; the Vice President of the United States; the Secretary of State; the Secretary of Defense; and the Director for Mutual Security. Also present were the Secretary of the Treasury; the Director of Defense Mobilization; the Director, Bureau of the Budget; General Collins for the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Director of Central Intelligence; The Assistant to the President; Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to the President; C. D. Jackson, Special Assistant to the President; General Persons, Special Assistant to the President; the Military Liaison Officer; Robert R. Bowie, Department of State; Frank C. Nash, Department of Defense; General Roberts, Office of the Director for Mutual Security; Elbert P. Tuttle, Department of the Treasury; W. Y. Elliott, Office of the Director of Defense Mobilization; General Gerhart, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Robert Amory, Jr., Central Intelligence Agency; the Executive Secretary, NSC; the Deputy Executive Secretary, NSC.

---

[1] Drafted on June 2 by S. Everett Gleason, the Acting Executive Secretary of the National Security Council.

There follows a summary of the discussion and the chief points taken at the meeting.

The Situation in the Near East and South Asia

Secretary Dulles said that obviously he would be unable to deal with all the events of his trip,[2] but he did wish to inform the Council of those aspects of it which affected NSC projects.

Egypt. Secretary Dulles and Mr. Stassen had arrived in Egypt with the expectation that it would be the key to the development of strength in the Middle East. Their view was now much modified. General Naguib had turned out not to be the "strong man" in Egypt, but merely a front behind which four military members of the Revolutionary Command Council exercised real power. . . . The situation with respect to the Suez base was extremely acute. Incidents occurred daily, and the Revolutionary Command Council was engaged in organizing a disguised military force for guerrilla operations against the British. In turn, the British were taking measures to meet this threat, and had developed plans for the reoccupation of Cairo and Alexandria in order to protect their nationals. If this occurred, the development would be disastrous for the Western powers.

Secretary Dulles said that he and Mr. Stassen had done everything they could to allay hostility to the United States, and believed that they had succeeded to a point. They had tried to educate General Naguib on the international importance of the Suez base, and had tried to indicate that the existence of this base on Egyptian soil did not constitute a violation of Egyptian sovereignty. It was rather a matter of assuring its availability in time of war. Secretary Dulles went on to add that it should certainly be possible to find a formula which would satisfy both the British and the Egyptians with regard to the Suez base. He had even outlined such a formula in Cairo. Though it was far from perfect, he believed it reasonably satisfied Western security interests in the base.

The British attitude Secretary Dulles described as "very tough", and it was quite possible they will not accept this new formula. We must, however, do our utmost to influence them to do so, since General Naguib had agreed to wait only two or three weeks after

[2] For documentation, see Documents 1 ff.

Secretary Dulles' return to Washington before taking action in the event of failure to resolve this issue. Secretary Dulles then pointed out to the Council that even if the United States succeeded in selling this new formula to the British and the Egyptians, the larger problem of political and economic stability in Egypt would be with us for years to come. He was therefore strongly inclined to believe that we must abandon our preconceived ideas of making Egypt the key country in building the foundations for a military defense of the Middle East.

Israel. Secretary Dulles found this country in an acute fiscal and economic situation. The Arab boycott was really hurting. He and Mr. Stassen had satisfied themselves that the Israelis genuinely desired peace. It was the view of the Israelis, however, that real peace with the Arab States could only come gradually through negotiation of specific issues seriatim, and not by a single over-all peace settlement.

The Israelis were obviously worried about the future direction of American policy, as were the Arabs. Israeli military strength Secretary Dulles estimated to be greater than the combined military strength of all the Arab States.

Secretary Dulles then informed the Council that he proposed, if the President agreed, to reaffirm in his broadcast this evening [3] the Tripartite Declaration which had been made by President Truman on May 25, 1950. This had been designed to allay fears of aggression both of the Arab States and Israel. It had not been a notable success with the Arabs in the past, but its reaffirmation by the Eisenhower Administration might make it more effective.

Syria. Secretary Dulles believed that Syria was a state that offered real possibilities, thanks to Shishakli, who was a much more impressive figure than Naguib in Egypt. He was a man of much broader vision and deeper understanding of the relation of his country to world problems. Syria impressed Secretary Dulles as having hopeful economic potentialities. If these could be developed, Syria might be able to absorb a considerable number of Arab refugees. The country, however, needed more concrete evidence of the good intentions of the United States.

Iraq. Secretary Dulles found Iraq to be the Arab State most plainly concerned with the Soviet threat, because it was closer to the USSR and because it bordered on Iran. Like Syria, Iraq offered good economic possibilities. Its government was forward-looking and was using the revenues from its oil resources for the development of the national economy.

[3] The June 1 speech of the Secretary of State is printed in Department of State Bulletin, June 15, 1953, pp. 831-835.

Saudi Arabia. Secretary Dulles reminded the Council of the particular importance of this country to the United States because of our great oil concession there, and also because of our air base. Our relations with Saudi Arabia were at the moment poor. King Ibn Saud was old and crotchety, and had given them some unpleasant moments because he felt that the United States was not giving him sufficiently strong support in his current disputes with the British Government with regard to British protectorates on the borders of Saudi Arabia. The British had sent troops into certain of these sheikhdoms. While this seemed a minor affair in comparison with other problems in the world, it could have very bad consequences for the United States. We are trying to arbitrate these disputes and we may succeed, but, given the temperament and age of King Ibn Saud, it was quite possible that he would decide to throw away his alliance with the United States, cancel the oil concession and the air base, and throw in his lot with some other nation which he might feel would be a more faithful ally.

These real difficulties were compounded by certain minor irritations. We had delivered defective tires for which the Saudi Arabian Government had been over-charged. We had trained a certain number of Saudi Arabian officers, but again at a high price. Such errors by the United States caused ill will and should be rectified at once.

The President interposed to express shocked surprise and to indicate his belief that we should undertake to train such Saudi Arabian officers without charge.

Iran. Secretary Dulles did not stop in Iran on his trip lest he appear to take sides in the present dispute, but he had had a talk with Ambassador Henderson while he was in Pakistan. He had furthermore exchanged messages with Prime Minister Mossadegh. As a result he had a somewhat more hopeful impression of the Iranian situation. It seemed to him likely that the country's agricultural economy could carry on for quite a time in the absence of an oil settlement, especially with a certain amount of technical assistance from the United States. Furthermore, Secretary Dulles warned the Council that even an oil settlement would not in itself bring stability to Iran, which woefully lacked any prospect of effective political leadership.

India. Secretary Dulles stated that he had had three talks with Prime Minister Nehru, and that these had been valuable in clearing away misapprehensions in the latter's mind. They had talked about the armistice negotiations, and Secretary Dulles had done his best to indicate that the United States really desired an armistice and was not resorting to technicalities to avoid one. However, he found Prime Minister Nehru an utterly impractical statesman, quite unable to understand why the United States could not have accepted the Indian Resolution in its original form despite the fact that it would have compromised our whole position against forced repatriation. Nor did Nehru seem able to comprehend our difficulties with the Republic of Korea Government, though Secretary Dulles believed that as a result of his conversations, Nehru was aware of the dilemma in which the United States found itself. Impractical as he was on so many of these matters, Prime Minister Nehru was described by Secretary Dulles as very "realistic" on matters directly affecting India, such as the Kashmir dispute. With respect to Nepal, likewise, Nehru had asserted that India had made clear to the world that the Himalayas were its northern boundary and that trouble could be expected if anyone chose to violate this frontier. In summary, Secretary Dulles believed that his visit to India had been helpful. Our relationship with that country would be improved for the future even if no immediate change were detected.

Pakistan. Secretary Dulles described himself as immensely impressed by the martial and religious characteristics of the Pakistanis. These qualities had made him and Mr. Stassen feel that Pakistan was a potential strong point for us, and that we must do our best to help to tide over the famine with a grant of wheat.

Greece and Turkey. On their return, the Secretary and Mr. Stassen had stopped briefly in Greece and Turkey, and were well impressed with what they saw. There were pleas for additional armament for the troops of these nations and, indeed, it seemed to Secretary Dulles that both countries were eager to support larger military establishments than their economies could bear.

Libya. This new state was obviously feeble and under heavy British influence. As an example of unfortunate American tactics, Secretary Dulles noted that this Government had made an agreement with the Libyan Government to pay $1 million a year rental for our air base there. Negotiations on this issue were still going on, and the Libyan Government wished to raise the sum to $2 million. While this was certainly a very large sum, Secretary Dulles thought it most unfortunate that we had not been willing to pay a nickel thus far for rent of the air base. We should certainly offer to give them $500,000 on account. This was one of those many small things that we could do to improve our relations with the several Arab States, and Secretary Dulles said that he had a list of twenty or thirty others.

Conclusions. To sum up, said Secretary Dulles, the prestige of the Western powers in the Middle East was in general very low. The United States suffered from being linked with British and French imperialism. Nevertheless, we still had a reserve of good will, as was shown by the security precautions taken to protect him and Mr. Stassen in the course of their journey, and by the friendly demeanor of the ordinary people in these countries. Accordingly, Secretary Dulles believed we could regain our lost influence if we made a real effort. The great difficulty was the complete preoccupation of the Arab States with their own local problems and their lack of understanding and interest in the threat posed by the Soviet Union.

The general concept that Secretary Dulles brought back with him was that Pakistan could be made a strong loyal point. So, obviously, could Turkey. Syria and Iraq realized their danger, and could probably be induced to join with us. As for the countries further south, they were too lacking in realization of the international situation to offer any prospect of becoming dependable allies. Iran, continued Secretary Dulles, was the obvious weak spot in what could become a strong defensive arrangement of the northern tier of states: Turkey, Iraq, Syria, and Pakistan. But this arrangement was not hopeless if we could save Iran. Our immediate need, therefore, was to concentrate on changing the situation there. There was still much strong anti-Soviet sentiment in the country.

This new concept of a defense organization, added Secretary Dulles, promised much more than the former project of starting with Egypt as the center of a Middle East Defense Organization.

The President asked for further details with regard to the British protectorates on the borders of Saudi Arabia.

Secretary Dulles replied that he was not certain, but he believed that the British had set up these sheikdoms as protectorates many years ago.

The President then inquired why, in view of the obvious need of the friendship of Saudi Arabia, the British insisted on hanging on to these coastal positions.

Secretary Dulles replied that their objective was oil and subsurface rights in these areas, which, he added, had no clear boundaries and were accordingly an inevitable source of dispute.

The President then remarked that such good will trips as the Secretary and Mr. Stassen had taken were fine, but that he believed that we ought to take action instantly on all the very sore points, some of which Secretry Dulles had identified. There should be a quick follow-up to remove the causes of Arab hostility.

The Secretary of State agreed, and the President went on to observe that we should at once make a token payment for the rent of our base in Libya. The good faith of the United States was plainly involved.

The President then informed the Council that a prominent Egyptian, together with the Egyptian Ambassador, had come in to see him earlier in the morning. They had informed the President that they recognized the necessity of preserving the Suez base and keeping it in good condition, but they also reminded him that they had been occupied by the British for seventy years and were suffering from an acute inferiority complex. They had made it clear to the President, moreover, that they expected the United States to find a solution to this problem which would include the maintenance of the Suez base for the West.

Mr. Stassen then briefed the Council, with the aid of charts, on problems in the Near East directly relating to the mutual security program. He noted the standard of living of the various states, the number of men under arms, the major religions, and former British-French jurisdiction in the area. He strongly seconded Secretary Dulles' exposition of a new concept for defense of the area based on the northern tier of nations.

The Secretary of State commented that the old MEDO concept was certainly finished. For one thing, Turkey was still greatly feared by the Arab countries which she had once controlled. A fresh start was needed on the problem of defense arrangements, and the only concept which would work was one which was based on the contribution of the indigenous peoples.

Mr. Stassen went on to tell the Council that in every one of the major disputes currently going on in the area, the participants depended to a greater or less degree on United States assistance. This fact should be borne in mind in all our dealings with these countries and their problems. It seemed to Mr. Stassen that the best approach by the United States in working out sound defensive arrangements with the northern tier of Arab States, was to make use of Military Advisory Groups (MAGs). If such missions could be got into the individual countries they might pull them together and work out satisfactory regional arrangements. In the first instance, United States assistance should be given to those countries willing to make an agreement to defend the passes and approaches of their countries against Soviet aggression.

Mr. Stassen also urgently recommended that the United States proceed forthwith to correct the situations of a minor character to which Secretary Dulles had referred and which the President had reemphasized.

As for Syria and Iraq, Mr. Stassen felt that our economic assistance should be directed to irrigation and water development which, when carried out, would enable these states to offer a living to the Arab refugees.

The President commented that in thinking things over, Secretary Dulles had perhaps been a little "too rough on the British." He also declared his determination not to take sides between the Israelis and the Arabs. As he had informed his Egyptian visitors earlier, there were five million Jewish votes in the United States and very few Arabs. In any case, said the President, he was glad that the Tripartite Declaration was to be reestablished, and he also believed that we should commence at once to talk with the British about establishing reasonable boundaries for their sheikdoms on the Arabian coast. If this were not done, the President warned, we should have more Irans on our hands.

The National Security Council: [4]

a. Noted an oral briefing by the Secretary of State and the Director for Mutual Security on their recent trip through the Near East and South Asia, with particular reference to the situation in Egypt, Israel, Syria, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Iran, India, Pakistan, Greece, Turkey and Libya.

b. Noted that the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President, proposed to reaffirm publicly the May 25, 1950 Tripartite Declaration.

c. Noted the conclusion of the Secretary of State that the present concept of a Middle East Defense Organization, with Egypt as the key, was not a realistic basis for present planning, and that the U.S. should concentrate now upon building a defense in the area based on the northern tier, including Pakistan, Iran, Iraq, Syria and Turkey.

d. Noted that the President deemed it of the greatest importance that all feasible actions identified by the Secretary of State and the Director for Mutual Security in the course of their trip, as desirable to rectify the causes of ill will towards the United States, should be undertaken immediately, including:

(1) A payment to Libya on account of rent from the U.S. for occupancy of the air base.

(2) An offer to train a small number of Saudi Arabian officers in the United States without reimbursement.

(3) Replacement of defective military equipment delivered to Saudi Arabia.

(4) Discussions with the British Government looking towards the settlement of conflicts over the boundaries between Saudi Arabia and the adjacent British protectorates.

(5) Consideration of a small amount of grant military equipment to Syria.

The Ambassador in Turkey (McGhee) to the Department of State

SECRET ANKARA, June 10, 1953—9 a. m.

Prime Minister asked why Secretary had lauded General Naguib, who is quoted as saying that Malenkov was peace-loving man (see Embdesp 776 May 28 enclosure 2,[2] reporting Secretary's conversation with President). Prime Minister expressed doubt that international interest in Suez and Egyptian sovereignty were, as Secretary indicated, not irreconcilable. Prime Minister stated in light vein, but apparently meaning it, that if British are forced withdraw their troops from Egypt Turks would be glad have them stationed in Turkey.

Prime Minister mentioned conversation which he had with Nuri Said in London, in course which he had asked Nuri whether Iraq could break with Arab League and join with Turkey in creating nucleus for ME defense. Although Nuri indicated this not presently possible, he intimated it might be in near future.

The Acting Permanent Representative on the North Atlantic Council (Anderson) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET PARIS, June 11, 1953—9 p. m.

Polto 2367. Department pass Secretary of Defense. Following formal council session yesterday afternoon, [1] permanent representatives met informally to hear Turkish statement regarding MEDO. In lengthy exposé Turk emphasized strategic military and political importance Middle East for defense of free world and vital necessity of establishing regional defense organization. Efforts heretofore made to bring about realization of MEDO have been checked by (1) Arab-Israeli differences and (2) deterioration Egypt-United Kingdom relations.

Turkey regards possibility of British withdrawal from Suez with great anxiety in view absence any defense system which could fill vacuum thus created. Turk emphasized this problem of concern not only to United Kingdom and Egypt, but to all of NATO countries, and it is duty of latter to give United Kingdom full support. . . . This creates grave situation which could easily play into hands of Soviets. Therefore, NATO powers should take drastic measures to organize Middle Eastern defense since united front would show Arab States they cannot play Soviets against Western powers.

Arab Governments are far from stable and subject to frequent revolutionary changes. Under circumstances, defense of Middle East should be organized without Arab participation and without Israeli as well, but doors should be kept open to ultimate membership.

United Kingdom representative expressed appreciation Turkish remarks, stating no government should permit Egypt to think one NATO partner can be played off against another. Evacuation of Canal Zone is last thing United Kingdom wants to do, but it is difficult to see how progress can be made toward organization Middle East defense unless Egyptian Government is reasonably well disposed. Turk replied firm attitude on part of NATO governments will doubtless have salutary effect on Egypt.

Ismay wondered why it would not be possible to organize MEDO without immediate Egyptian participation, feeling that such step would have powerful influence on Egypt. He had been impressed by London Prime Ministers' Conference[2] at which India and Pakistan had both agreed with other Prime Ministers that defense of Canal Zone vital.

[1] For documentation on this topic, see vol. v, Part 1, pp. 408 ff.

Greek representative acknowledged efficacy Turkish colleagues' arguments but counseled caution, pointing out possibility Arabs might be thrown into arms of Soviets if MEDO formed without their participation. Such a decision, if made public, might irritate Arabs and make them more recalcitrant. Turk explained he suggested no formal communiqué, but merely advocated coordination in council of NATO governments policies and moral support for United Kingdom in its dealings with Egypt, leaving complete freedom of action to United Kingdom delegate.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 17, 1953.

Subject: American and British Attitudes on Middle East Defense

Participants: British Embassy: Mr. Beeley
NEA: Mr. Jernegan

Mr. Beeley asked me to give him our present thinking on the general question of Middle East defense. I outlined it as follows:

1. We had decided that the MEDO concept had to be put on the shelf for the present. The political atmosphere in the Arab States simply made it useless to push this plan. (Mr. Beeley indicated the Foreign Office agreed with this view.)
2. We thought the best plan for the moment would be to work individually with those States which seemed most disposed to cooperate with the West for defense. These would include Iraq, Syria and Pakistan.
3. So far as concrete military planning for area defense was concerned, in the absence of participation by States in the area, we had reached no firm position. However, on the working level the Department inclined to feel that planning should be done secretly and rather informally by military representatives of the Nations principally concerned. Ideally, we would probably prefer to have this restricted to the United Kingdom, Turkey and the United States but I recognized it would probably be necessary to include France as well. (Mr. Beeley said he thought the British Government would feel obliged to insist on participation by Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.) I did not think we would recommend the recent Turkish suggestion that the Western Powers proceed immediately to establish a formal public planning organization for Middle East defense. NEA, at least, considered such a formal public organization would be badly received by the Arabs.

Mr. Beeley said the working level of the Foreign Office had recently restated its own old position in favor of a public MEDO along the lines of the Turkish suggestion. This restatement was now being circulated among interested Government Departments in London. He himself was not sure however that this was a sound position nor was he sure that it was completely accepted in the Foreign Office itself.

In connection with the discussions on the Iraqi situation, Mr. Beeley indicated concurrence of the Foreign Office in the idea of working with individual Arab States, notably Iraq, as a start toward building up area defense.

The Ambassador in Turkey (McGhee) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET ANKARA, June 18, 1953—4 p. m.

1511. I believe it important that decision be made soonest regarding United States position on Middle East defense. Uncertainty as to definitive United States views will, I fear, result in increased differences among several MEDO-sponsoring powers and perpetuate current speculation there are serious differences between United States and Turkey this subject. Before my departure [1] I wish submit following observations as of posible use to Department in deciding best course of action. (See Embtel 1454, June 2 [2] and Embdesp 791, June 3 [3] regarding Turkish proposal on Middle East defense):

[2] Not printed; it summarized a memorandum handed to the Embassy Counselor by the Turkish Under Secretary of State on June 1. The memorandum reviewed the lack of favorable reaction from Egypt and other Arab States on the Middle East Defense Organization proposals and concluded that Arab participation in a defense organization was unlikely in the foreseeable future. The Turkish Government concluded, therefore, that the United States, United Kingdom, France, and Turkey should immediately establish a Middle East Defense Organization, clearly stating that the organization would be open to accession by all Middle East countries. (780.5/6-253) Continued

Turk position as given reference telegram in essence writes off possibility Arab collaboration in MEDO in forseeable future and proposes United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey move to establish Middle East defense organization open to later adherence by any Middle East state. British will likely support this proposal if stalemate with Egypt on Suez persists.

Turk reaction is that Secretary's reference Middle East defense June 1 address rather negative. They feel we recognize that establishment MEDO with Arab participation now remote possibility, but that we fail draw what they consider logical and necessary conclusion to go ahead with defense organization without Arabs. Statement in Secretary's address that Middle East collective security system "should be designed and come from within out of a sense of common design and common danger" leads Turks to fear we are prepared wait indefinitely for such manifestation Arab disposition cooperate with us. Turk argument is that we must close dangerous Middle East security gap soonest, and positive action this direction may actually spur Arab participation.

Nub of whole problem obviously effect on Arabs of overt establishment Middle East defense organization by four powers. It may eventually be necessary to take some such open step if Soviet threat still considered to exist. However, we feel immediate Arab reaction to overt planning for defense their area in absence their approval and participation likely to be negative, and that the eventual achievement our political objective of collaboration with Middle East states would therefore be rendered more difficult. We do not, in fact, believe in the "set up shop" theory of attracting the Arabs.

It would seem that we could find middle course between immediate overt action by four powers as proposed by Turks (and presumably British), and no action at all. Desirable course of action might be to leave MEDO project in abeyance for time being while intensifying unpublicized planning for defense Middle East by United States, British and Turkish military representatives. This course would leave way open for later Arab initiative or for capitalizing on particular situations, such as Iraq, envisaged by Secretary, especially if Suez question eventually resolved.

Informal exchanges of views among British, United States and Turkish military have already taken place, (General Robertson, General Wyman and Turkish General Staff representatives) which could perhaps be stepped up and formalized. French participation not considered necessary or desirable at present since only first

The Department of State answered in telegram 1477 to Ankara, June 18, not printed. It informed the Embassy that "problem of further measures re ME defense planning arrangements now under study USG. Reply to Turks' proposal to 'set up shop' promptly must wait completion this study. However, Foreign Minister might be told informally that while Department agrees dangerous leave ME defense gap indefinitely, inclined question tactic of openly establishing exclusively Western defense organization for ME in face of Arab opposition." three powers presently have military forces this area (counting United States Sixth Fleet). Such interim approach would, I believe, satisfy Turkish anxiety take affirmative steps, while avoiding danger negative Arab reaction during present very fluid period.

This connection, in my final substantive meeting with Foreign Minister June 17 latter indicated in passing that he personally favored covert approach to Middle East military planning at present time. He did not, however, indicate any official change in Turkish position as stated in note transmitted Embassy Despatch 791. This remark could have meant official Turkish position, which was first announced by Prime Minister during his visit with Foreign Minister to London last fall, derives from Prime Minister personally and views, being similar to those of British, may be ones which British persuaded him to adopt during his visit.

SECRET [Washington,] June 26, 1953.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: In a memorandum of June 25 [24], 1952, forwarded to this Department with the concurrence of the Acting Secretary of Defense on June 28, 1952, [2] the Joint Chiefs of Staff stated, "The importance of the Middle East area is such that planning arrangements should proceed regardless of whether the Arab states elect to participate at this time in the Middle East Defense Organization". Since that date, the United States Government in developing plans for the Middle East has operated on the tacit assumption that Arab cooperation would be won and a MEDO established in the near future.

The Department of State is now convinced that it would be unrealistic to continue to operate on this assumption, and that our plans should be adjusted to take account of the improbability of effecting the creation of a Middle East defense arrangement including the Arab states until there has been a significant improvement in the political atmosphere of the region.

[1] Drafted by Daspit and cleared by S/S, S/P, EUR, G, NE, and GTI. Attached to a memorandum from Jernegan to the Secretary of State through Matthews, dated June 17, suggesting that he sign the attached letter requesting the views of the Secretary of Defense as to the desirability of proceeding with planning arrangements for the Middle East which would include only the Western powers. (780.5/6-1753)

[2] Not printed, but see footnote 2, Document 80.

The question thus arises—assuming the Department of Defense continues to hold the views quoted above as to what form of Middle East planning arrangement we should seek to establish under existing circumstances, taking account of considerations both of military efficiency and of political expediency.

In the view of this Department, it would not now be desirable openly to establish an exclusively Western planning arrangement for Middle East defense in the face of Arab opposition. Such action would have adverse political effects and would probably further postpone Arab cooperation with the West. It should be possible to accomplish essential military planning through informal, and unpublicized, arrangements which would not risk these undesirable effects. Although it seems unlikely that they would be adequate for the purposes stated in the memorandum of the Joint Chiefs of Staff cited above, the present arrangements for continuing consultation between Headquarters, Allied Forces, Southern Europe, and the United Kingdom-Middle East Land Forces provide an example of the type of unpublicized Middle East defense planning which this Department considers appropriate under present circumstances.

The Department of State would appreciate being informed as to whether the Department of Defense continues to be convinced that defense planning arrangements for the Middle East should proceed even though Arab cooperation cannot now be expected, and, if so, the views of the Department of Defense concerning the nature of such arrangements and the countries which should participate.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Memorandum of Discussion at the 153d Meeting of the National Security Council, Thursday, July 9, 1953 [1]

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY

The following were present at the 153rd meeting of the Council: The President of the United States, Presiding; the Vice President of the United States; the Secretary of State; the Secretary of Defense; the Deputy Director for Mutual Security; the Director, Office of Defense Mobilization. Also present were the Secretary of the Treasury; the Chairman, Federal Communications Commission (for Item 1); General Collins for the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; the Director of Central Intelligence; Robert Cutler, Special Assistant to the President; C.D. Jackson, Special Assistant to the President; Colonel Paul T. Carroll, Acting White House Staff Secretary; Ralph Clark, Central Intelligence Agency (for Item 1); Commander Perry Johnson, USN, Central Intelligence Agency (for Item 1); J. J. Hitchcock, Central Intelligence Agency (for Items 1 and 2); the Acting Executive Secretary, NSC; and Hugh D. Farley, NSC Special Staff Member.

There follows a summary of the discussion at the meeting and the main points taken.

[Here follows discussion of the following agenda items: electromagnetic communications, significant world developments affecting United States security, and the situation in Korea.]

4. United States Objectives and Policies With Respect to the Near East (NSC 155) [2]

In introducing the report, Mr. Cutler observed that it had been revised to reflect the views which the Secretary of State and the Director for Mutual Security had brought back from their trip through the Near East. The chief new points in the present report were as follows: (1) MEDO was no longer played up as a likely defense arrangement in the future; (2) Egypt was no longer considered to be the nucleus of an area defense organization, and the so-called northern tier of states had been substituted for it; (3) a new look had been taken at the Suez base problem; and (4) the report advocated greater independence and greater responsibility in the area by the United States vis-à-vis Britain.

[1] Drafted on July 10 by S. Everett Gleason, Acting Executive Secretary of the National Security Council.

[2] Regarding NSC 155, see Cutler's memorandum, Document 134. For text of NSC 155/1, July 14, see infra.

After Mr. Cutler had read the General Objectives and the General Courses of Action in NSC 155, he asked the Secretary of State to comment.

Secretary Dulles replied that he really had nothing to add to the comments he had made upon returning from his recent trip. He merely wanted to take the occasion, therefore, to stress one or two points which constituted changes from our previous policies toward the states of this area.

The first was the impracticality of the MEDO concept. It was too complicated, too much like NATO, and it obviously would not work. Something less formal and grandiose was needed as a substitute.

Secondly, Egypt must be discounted as a strong point for the foreseeable future, because it was so engrossed in its own problems that the free world could not depend upon it as the cornerstone of a Near East structure. On the other hand, the so-called northern tier of nations, stretching from Pakistan to Turkey, were feeling the hot breath of the Soviet Union on their necks, and were accordingly less preoccupied with strictly internal problems or with British and French imperialism. Secretary Dulles also expressed the hope that the missing link in this northern tier—namely, Iran—would some day join to eliminate the gap in the northern tier.

Accordingly, the Secretary summed up his view that separate bilateral arrangements with the states of this area were much preferable at the moment to arrangements modelled on NATO. Even so, it was dangerous to exaggerate even this possibility, but every effort should be made in view of the terrible repercussions on Europe of the loss of the Near East to the Soviets and the great advantages which would accrue to the Soviets if they secured this prize. In short, the present policy was more modest, more realistic, and more apt to produce results.

At the conclusion of Secretary Dulles' remarks the President said he had one observation to make. Without desiring to defend all the details in the concept of MEDO, he pointed out that we should not minimize the very great advantages which we derive from such multilateral defense arrangements in which the United States participated. He said that we might well want bases in the Near East at some future time, or that we might even wish to station troops in the area. The great advantage of the NATO type of defense arrangement was in providing for such contingencies. The President added, to illustrate his point, that if some arrangement had existed whereby the Western powers and the United States could have sent armed forces to the Suez base area, say, in January 1951, we might have been spared the terrible fight between Egypt and Great Britain. Whatever the difficulties, such pacts as he had in mind, said the President, permitted us greater flexibility, and we must not allow the MEDO concept to disappear entirely from our thinking. It should be reconsidered if at some future time it appeared more practicable.

In reply to the President, Secretary Dulles said that the State Department was now engaged in trying to devise a formula which would permit the stationing of United States and British forces in the Suez Canal area in the event of the threat of an attack. The general idea of the formula was that any of the Arab States which believed itself threatened by external aggression would have the right to call for the assistance of one or more of the Western powers. This formula was to be achieved by bilateral negotiations, since these were more likely to succeed than arrangements based on the Arab League or on MEDO.

Secretary Dulles also pointed out that he would certainly discuss the Suez problem again with the Marquess of Salisbury when the latter reached Washington for the Foreign Ministers conference. Time was of the essence, continued Secretary Dulles, because the Egyptians had warned him when he was in Cairo that they could keep the lid on until after we had talked about this problem again with the British, but that thereafter trouble would begin if no settlement were reached. Unfortunately, continued Secretary Dulles, Mr. Churchill has been absolutely adamant on holding the Suez base, and whether he can be induced to take a more flexible position was a question. The British were convinced that the Egyptians would ultimately give in if the British stood pat. We, on the other hand, believe that if the British do stand pat, Egyptian guerrillas will attack the base.

Mr. Cutler informed the Council that the Defense Department had misgivings with regard to paragraph 16–f of the present paper, which called for consideration and exchanging more formal commitments with such Arab countries as gave convincing demonstration of a determination to defend themselves and of willingness to cooperate with the United States.

The President then suggested that the Defense Department explain its views.

General Collins replied that he was simply unable to understand the nature of the more formal commitments herein proposed, and stated that the Staff Study did little or nothing to indicate the nature of these commitments. Noting, however, that paragraph 16–d contemplated bilateral treaties with several states, General Collins supposed that paragraph 16–f at least contemplated something more than that.

Mr. Cutler pointed out that the earlier sections of paragraph 16 referred to military assistance, whereas the commitments in paragraph 16-f indicated the possibility of sending token U.S. forces to certain of these countries or to the establishment of base rights for U.S. forces in them.

Secretary Dulles agreed with the views of Mr. Cutler as to the meaning of the paragraph, but said that the possibility of a situation arising in which it would be possible for the United States to make more formal commitments for the defense of the states of this area, now appeared to be so remote that he was quite willing to strike the paragraph and to substitute for it a statement that such commitments might be considered at some future time if conditions warranted.

After further discussion of the use proposed for these funds, Secretary Dulles warned the Council of the continued deterioration of Israel's fiscal and economic situation, which was caused by the overimportation of goods. A serious financial crisis impended in Israel. We had already been obliged to loan them $7 million to prevent default, and Secretary Dulles anticipated that the Israelis would be back presently with a request for $100 million to stave off impending bankruptcy.

The President inquired whether we were being as tough with the Israelis as with any other nation.

The Vice President added that this question was precisely what disturbed him. As he saw the situation, the United States had been for some years under very heavy political pressure to subsidize an Israeli economy which could never balance itself. It began to look as though they would come back again and again for handouts from the United States, with no prospect of permanent stabilization or improvement.

The President remarked that he had had Rabbi Silver in yesterday and had pointed out to him quite frankly that under no circumstances would the United States favor the Israelis above the Arabs or vice versa. The whole objective of our policy, he had said to Rabbi Silver, was to try to induce these enemies to get along with each other. The President added that Rabbi Silver said that such a policy was fine with him.

Secretary Dulles went on to say that troublesome as was the present status of Israel, worse was in store thanks to their program for bringing to Israel some two million more Jewish refugees in the near future. Such a program, if carried out, thought the Secretary, would finish off whatever faint hope there was for economic stability. If we bailed them out of their present serious situation, we can only anticipate that they will go ahead and bring in additional refugees. It was precisely this prospect, moreover, that so worried and terrified the Arabs, who felt that if many more Jewish refugees were brought within the confines of Israel, that small country would explode and that the Arabs would be the chief victims of the explosion. If, said Secretary Dulles, we could somehow get the Israelis to put an end to their ambitious immigration program, this would do more than anything else to ease tension between Israel and the Arab States. As a matter of fact, Secretary Dulles pointed out, according to reports, Adlai Stevenson had taken a very tough stand on this question in recent conversations with Ben-Gurion.

Secretary Humphrey said that he had understood that the United States had told the Israelis that they would have to finance their immigration program with their present resources and credit arrangements.

Secretary Dulles replied that indeed we had said just this, but the question was, can we actually maintain this stand? . . .

There was general agreement with this position.

The National Security Council: [3]

Adopted the statement of policy contained in NSC 155, subject to the following changes:

a. Insert a new subparagraph 12-b to read as follows, and reletter the subsequent subparagraphs appropriately:

> "12-b. Capitalize on such elements of strength as remain to the British in the area by such support of United Kingdom positions as may be consistent with U.S. principles and policy objectives."

b. Delete subparagraph 16-f and substitute the following:

> "If more formal commitments with respect to defense arrangements in the area should appear desirable, submit appropriate proposals for Council consideration."

c. Appendix A, "Near East Financial Data", should be revised to show only total economic aid to the area, without reference to specific states, in order that flexibility in the use of available funds on a regional basis may be maintained, as set forth in paragraph 17-a.

Note: The statement of policy in NSC 155, as amended, subsequently approved by the President and circulated as NSC 155/1.

[Here follows discussion of other agenda items, including the possibilities of reducing the United States civilian population in sensitive areas abroad, continental defense, the Volunteer Freedom Corps, and foreign reactions to administration policies.]

Statement of Policy by the National Security Council [1]

[WASHINGTON,] July 14, 1953.

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO THE NEAR EAST [*]

(Parenthetical references are to paragraphs in the Staff Study)

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. The Near East is of great strategic, political and economic importance to the free world. The area contains the greatest petroleum resources in the world; essential locations for strategic military bases in any world conflict against Communism; the Suez Canal; and natural defensive barriers. It also contains the Holy Places of the Christian, Jewish, and Moslem worlds, and thereby exerts religious and cultural influences affecting people everywhere. The security interests of the United States would be critically endangered if the Near East should fall under Soviet influence or control. (3)

2. Current conditions and trends in the Near East are inimical to Western interests. During recent years the prestige and position of the West have declined. The nations of the Near East are determined to assert their independence and are suspicious of outside interest in their affairs. In particular, the influence of the United Kingdom has been weakened, with distrust and hatred replacing

[1] Besides this statement of policy, NSC 155/1 includes a note by the Executive Secretary stating that the National Security Council and the Secretary of the Treasury had adopted NSC 155 at the 153d meeting of the NSC on July 9, subject to the changes made in NSC Action No. 843 (see supra). The President on July 11 approved the statement of policy as amended and approved by the NSC and directed its implementation by all appropriate executive departments and agencies of the U.S. Government, under the coordination of the Secretary of State. NSC 155/1 superseded NSC 129/1, Document 71.

Two appendices, Appendix A, "Near East Financial Data", and Appendix B, "Tripartite Declaration by the Governments of the United Kingdom, France, and the United States (May 25, 1952)", are printed below. An NSC Staff Study on "United States Objectives and Policies With Respect to the Near East" is also included in NSC 155/1. The Staff Study is not printed because many of the paragraphs are the same as paragraphs in the statement of policy printed here.

[*] Includes Egypt, Yemen, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Israel, Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, the Arabian Peninsula Sheikdoms. Iran, the subject of a separate policy statement (NSC 136/1), is not included. This paper takes into account the importance of Turkey and Pakistan to the Near East, particularly as regards defense of the area, but does not attempt full coverage of U.S. policies toward Turkey and Pakistan, which are included in other NSC reports (NSC 36/2, NSC 109, and NSC 98/1). [Footnote in the source text.]

the former colonial subservience. France is also disliked and distrusted because of her refusal to free Morocco and Tunisia and because of her former role as a mandate power in Syria and Lebanon. Some of the distrust of the United Kingdom and France has devolved upon the United States, as an ally of both. Even more important, the Arab nations are incensed by what they believe to be our pro-Israel policy. In addition, acute political and economic instability; military weakness; widespread unrest; Arab–Israel tensions; the UK controversies with Egypt, Iran and Saudi Arabia; the French North African problem; and the Soviet activity are also unfavorable to the West. (4–13)

3. In the Near East the current danger to the security of the free world arises not so much from the threat of direct Soviet military attack as from a continuation of the present unfavorable trends. Unless these trends are reversed, the Near East may well be lost to the West within the next few years. (5)

4. Efforts to prevent the loss of the Near East will require increasing responsibility, initiative, and leadership by the United States in the area. Even though British and French influence in the Near East has declined, the UK retains substantial interests, experience, and security positions, so that the United States will need to act in concert with the United Kingdom to the greatest extent practicable, while reserving the right to act with others (e.g., France and Turkey) or alone. It is important to the settlement of outstanding political disputes that the United States convince the Arab states that it is capable of acting independently of other Western states and of Israel. (6, 14–18)

5. An organization of Near Eastern states in which the West would participate, or with which it would be associated, would probably enhance the security and stability of the area. However, until real progress can be made in settling present disputes and differences between the British and French and the local states, and until the present strong emotions of the Arab World emanating from the Israeli issue have been at least reduced, the possibility of cooperation with the Arab states generally in a formal defense organization seems unlikely. (6)

OBJECTIVES

6. Availability to the United States and its allies of the resources, the strategic positions, and the passage rights of the area, and the denial of such resources and strategic positions to the Soviet bloc. (2–a)

7. Stable, viable, friendly governments in the area, capable of withstanding communist-inspired subversion from within, and willing to resist communist aggression. (2–b)

8. Settlement of major issues between the Arab states and Israel as a foundation for establishing peace and order in the area. (2-c)

9. Reversal of the anti-American trends of Arab opinion. (2-d)

10. Prevention of the extension of Soviet influence in the area. (2-e)

11. Wider recognition in the free world of the legitimate aspirations of the countries in the area to be recognized as, and have the status of, sovereign states; and wider recognition by such countries of their responsibility toward the area and toward the free world generally. (2-f)

GENERAL COURSES OF ACTION

12. The United States should:

a. Assume an increased share of responsibility toward the area, acting in concert with the United Kingdom to the greatest extent practicable, but reserving the right to act with others or alone. (14-18)

b. Capitalize on such elements of strength as remain to the British in the area by such support of United Kingdom positions as may be consistent with U.S. principles and policy objectives. [2] (18)

c. Win the Arab states to a belief that we sympathize with their legitimate aspirations and respect their interests. (18)

d. Increase its efforts to achieve a settlement of the political differences among the states of the area, and between them and the Western nations. (18)

e. Seek to guide the revolutionary and nationalistic pressures throughout the area into orderly channels not antagonistic to the West, rather than attempt merely to preserve the status quo. (5-13, 32-33)

f. Stimulate measures of self-help, encourage the expansion of private investment, and provide somewhat increased economic and technical assistance. (32-34, 44-b)

g. Render limited military assistance. (14-18)

h. Encourage and be prepared to participate in collective efforts to increase the stability and strengthen the security of the area. (15-18, 32-43)

i. Support leadership groups which offer the best prospect of orderly progress towards free world objectives. (33, 44-c)

j. Make clear to the nations in the area the basically hostile intentions of the Soviet regime. (44-e)

SPECIFIC COURSES OF ACTION

13. Saudi Arabia. The United States should strengthen its special position with respect to Saudi Arabia to an extent compatible with general U.S. policies in the area. (22)

14. Arab-Israel Tension. The United States should:

[2] Paragraph 12-b was a new addition made at the July 9 meeting of the NSC. After its addition, the subsequent subparagraphs were relettered.

a. Make clear that Israel will not, merely because of its Jewish population, receive preferential treatment over any Arab state; and thereby demonstrate that our policy toward Israel is limited to assisting Israel in becoming a viable state living in amity with the Arab states and that our interest in the well-being of each of the Arab states corresponds substantially with our interest in Israel. (23-26)

b. Use our influence to bring about, by political, economic, and psychological measures a progressive reduction in tension between the Arab states and Israel leading to conditions under which ultimate peace may be secured. (23-26)

c. Reaffirm the May 25, 1950 Tripartite Declaration; † and make clear the determination of the United States to take effective action, including the use of sanctions against an aggressor. (16)

d. Seek progress in solving the Arab refugee problem through: (1) resettlement in neighboring Arab countries; (2) to the extent feasible, repatriation to the area now controlled by Israel; (3) to the extent feasible, emigration to countries outside the Near East; (4) settlement of problems concerning development projects, blocked Arab funds, and compensation for Arab refugee property. (26)

e. Use our influence to secure Arab-Israel boundary settlements, which may include some concessions by Israel.

f. Discourage further large-scale Jewish immigration to Israel. (26-b)

g. Help to restore normal commercial intercourse, and surface and air transportation between Israel and the Arab states. (34, 40)

h. Cooperate in seeking a fair settlement of the status of Jerusalem and the Holy Places in Palestine, acceptable to the states directly involved and to most nations of the free world. (26-d)

15. Egypt. The United States should:

a. In concert with the United Kingdom and Egypt, seek an early negotiated settlement of the Suez Canal Base and related defense questions. Such a settlement should provide for withdrawal of British forces, but under conditions to insure the continued maintenance of the base and its availability to the Western Powers in the event of hostilities or grave threat thereof. (20)

b. Take such steps, and secure the necessary commitments, as to best insure that the Suez Canal remains open to international trade. (19-21)

c. As progress in reaching an Anglo-Egyptian settlement warrants, extend economic and military assistance to Egypt. (19-21)

16. Area Defense. The United States should:

a. Develop secretly plans for the defense of the area with the United Kingdom, Turkey, and such others as may be desirable. (31)

b. Take leadership in bringing the countries of the area into an organization in which the Western powers participate (or with which they are associated) and which is designed to influence the political orientation, increase the internal stability, and strengthen the defense of the area, recognizing that the political base for such an organization does not now exist and must first be brought into being. (27-31)

c. Seek to secure participation in such an organization, whenever politically practicable, of such other Asian and African states, particularly Pakistan, as might contribute to the security and stability of the Near East.

d. Provide limited military assistance to promote U.S. security interests, to increase confidence in the United States, and to help in developing indigenous forces which can improve political stability, internal security, and the maintenance of pro-Western regimes, and ultimately contribute to area defense. We should select certain key states for this type of assistance, choosing those who are most keenly aware of the threat of Soviet Russia and who are geographically located to stand in the way of possible Soviet aggression. In this regard, special consideration should be given to Turkey, Iraq, Syria, Iran and Pakistan. (27-31)

e. Seek to obtain transit and base rights where required within the area, and, upon the threat of and during general hostilities, the right to operate forces in the territories of the various nations of the area. (29)

f. If more formal commitments with respect to defense arrangements in the area should appear desirable, submit appropriate proposals for Council consideration. [3]

17. Economic Aid. The United States should:

a. Give somewhat increased economic aid so as to provide a base for necessary economic development, encourage the concept of self-help and mutual cooperation, and contribute to the settlement of disputes in the area. Maintain flexibility in the use of available funds on a regional basis so as to take advantage of changing developments in an unstable area. (32-43)

b. Encourage Near Eastern governments to recognize that the bulk of the capital required for their economic development can best be supplied by private enterprise and public banking facilities, and that their own self-interest requires the creation of a climate which will attract private investment. (37)

c. Continue to provide limited financial assistance towards the settlement of the Arab refugee problem. (34)

d. Continue limited technical assistance with emphasis on increased food production, and better health, education, communications, and transportation. Encourage private foundations and industry to provide technical assistance for the same purposes. (34)

e. Encourage the wise use by each country of its oil royalties to promote a more stable and viable economy. In this regard, consideration should be given to the establishment of an area-wide development fund, in which the West would participate, and through which states having no oil resources might benefit from those who have. (37)

f. Progressively reduce the amount of economic aid furnished to Israel, so as to bring it in to impartial relationship to aid to others in the area.

TRIPARTITE DECLARATION BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, FRANCE, AND THE UNITED STATES (MAY 25, 1950)

The Governments of the United Kingdom, France, and the United States, having had occasion during the recent Foreign Ministers' Meeting in London to review certain questions affecting the peace and stability of the Arab states and of Israel, and particularly that of the supply of arms and war material to these states, have resolved to make the following statements:

1. The three Governments recognize that the Arab states and Israel all need to maintain a certain level of armed forces for the purposes of assuring their internal security and their legitimate self-defense and to permit them to play their part in the defense of the area as a whole. All applications for arms or war material for these countries will be considered in the light of these principles. In this connection the three Governments wish to recall and reaffirm the terms of the statements made by their representatives on the Security Council on August 4, 1949, in which they declared their opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab states and Israel.

2. The three Governments declare that assurances have been received from all the states in question, to which they permit arms to be supplied from their countries, that the purchasing state does not intend to undertake any act of aggression against any other state. Similar assurances will be requested from any other state in the area to which they permit arms to be supplied in the future.

3. The three Governments take this opportunity of declaring their deep interest in and their desire to promote the establishment and maintenance of peace and stability in the area and their unalterable opposition to the use of force or threat of force between any of the states in that area. The three Governments, should they find that any of these states was preparing to violate frontiers or armistice lines, would, consistently with their obligations as members of the United Nations, immediately take action, both within and outside the United Nations, to prevent such violation.

U.S. POSITION ON MEDO AND RELATED QUESTIONS

The Department refers to Embassy despatch No. 10, July 1, 1953 [2] which reports certain views of the Counselor of the French Embassy and of the Head of the Third Office of the Direction General of Political Affairs, Foreign Office, concerning Middle East defense and asks for information concerning developments in connection with MEDO and related questions.

So far as the Department is concerned, MEDO is, at least for the time being, "on the shelf". The Secretary stated this position in his speech of July [June] 1st, 1953 in which he referred to a Middle East defense organization as a "future rather than an immediate possibility". In the course of the Secretary's tour of the Middle East, he found that Arab resistance to a Western-sponsored defense organization was so powerful as to rule out all possibility of securing their cooperation at this time. The British were informed of these conclusions in the course of the meeting of Foreign Ministers in Washington this month.

These views were discussed with the Turks during the Secretary's visit at Ankara. The Turks agreed as to the impossibility of securing Arab cooperation at the present time but urged the establishment of an organization for Middle East defense to include the United States, Turkey, the United Kingdom and France.

[1] Sent to Rome and repeated to London, Paris, Tel Aviv, Amman, Pretoria, Canberra, Baghdad, Beirut, Cairo, Damascus, Wellington, Karachi, Jidda, Addis Ababa, Nairobi, and Athens. Drafted by Daspit and cleared by NE, GTI, WE, RA, BNA, G, and S/S.

[2] Despatch 10 from Rome, not printed, reported that the head of the Third Office indicated his personal belief that the Western powers, particularly the United States and United Kingdom, were devising a system of peripheral defense in the Middle East, which would obviate the necessity for a Middle East Defense Organization. (780.5/7-153)

The establishment of defense arrangements for the Middle East in which the states of the area would cooperate with certain of the Western powers remain an objective of US policy. The Department considers, however, that states within the area must themselves assume some initiative in creation of such an organization and that the role of the Western powers should not appear so dominant as in the MEDO proposals. The Department does not consider that it would be desirable to proceed with the establishment of an exclusively Western organization for Middle East defense as proposed by the Turks (and at various times by the French and British as well) since such an act would in all probability be interpreted by the Arabs as a challenge rather than an invitation, and would render more difficult the task of ultimately securing their cooperation.

In the absence of a regional organization it is the intention of the Department to promote increasingly close cooperation with those states of the Middle East which are most conscious of the Soviet threat and most disposed to cooperate with the Western powers. The new Mutual Security legislation authorizes an appropriation of $50 million for military aid programs to countries of the Near East and Africa other than Greece, Turkey and Iran and, assuming that appropriations are forthcoming, the Departments of State and Defense would expect to utilize these provisions in furtherance of this objective. It is hoped that these measures may contribute to the development of conditions out of which cooperative defense arrangements will evolve. However, there is no blueprint for such arrangements and the Department's views as to the means by which they might be developed are too tentative and flexible to warrant description as a "design". The Secretary in his speech of June 1 stated that collective security arrangements for the region "must grow from within." It is the Department's view that the Western powers most directly concerned should attempt to encourage and stimulate this growth, but not to force it or to impose a pattern for its development.

The question of possible steps which might be taken in the near future toward filling the gap which now exists in defense planning for the Middle East is now under study in the United States Government, and formal approaches to the other MEDO sponsors to acquaint them with current U.S. views on Middle East defense problems are being delayed until the completion of this study. The Embassy, therefore, should not take the initiative in discussing these problems with the Italian Foreign Office. The background information provided in this airgram is for use in the event the Embassy should feel called on to comment on these matters in response to questions from the Foreign Office or from representatives of the other MEDO sponsors.

780.5/8-1753

The Secretary of Defense (Wilson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, August 17, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In view of recent developments which seem to indicate that the establishment of a Middle East Defense Organization is not probable within the near future, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have restated the concept under which they believe military aid to the Middle East should be administered. Their concept has been approved and adopted as the Department of Defense position. Paragraphs of interest to the Department of State excerpted from the memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff follow:

"In our memorandum dated 23 January 1953 [1] (reference b of your memorandum), we expressed the view that the problem of military aid to the Middle East (ME) falls into two phases. This memorandum assumed that a Middle East Defense Organization (MEDO) would be established during the first phase of this program. Inasmuch as recent developments indicate that the establishment of a MEDO will be postponed indefinitely, it is considered desirable to restate our concept of the nature of these two phases. The first phase would be in the nature of a priming operation and modest in scope, designed primarily to establish a politico-military climate favorable for obtaining the participation of the individual states in planning for the defense of the ME. In this first phase, it would not be possible to relate individual allocations to an over-all plan. Second phase aid would be apportioned on the basis of detailed studies concerning requirements for defense of ME and these studies must necessarily be made by some form of Allied military planning organization in collaboration with the Arab States. As stated in this 23 January memorandum, we supported an increase of $100,000,000 in FY 1954 Mutual Defense Assistance Program (MDAP) funds for military aid to ME countries as a part of the first phase.

"In arriving at a suitable force basis for the initiation of first phase military aid programs we are of the opinion that the type and size of the forces should:

> "a. Be based generally on the size of the military establishments currently maintained by ME countries, with a view toward modernization rather than expansion.

> "b. Contribute initially to internal security and establish a foundation for eventual incorporation into an effective ME defense force.
> "c. Be in consonance with the technical ability of the indigenous personnel."

As established in previous correspondence with the Department of State and as pointed out above, the first phase of this program is considered to be primarily for the purpose of establishing a politico-military atmosphere favorable for obtaining the participation of the individual states in planning for the defense of the Middle East. Except as allocations for the first phase may affect the second phase of the program, it is not possible to relate the initial allocations of aid to each country of the Middle East to an over-all military plan. In this connection, your attention is invited to the "Survey of Current U.S. Base Requirements Outside the Continental U.S." which will be forwarded to the Department of State within the next few days.[2]

Accordingly, the Department of State is requested to set forth the political factors which should be taken into consideration by the Department of Defense in planning the execution of the first phase of the program for the Middle East area.

Sincerely yours,

C.E. WILSON

The Acting Secretary of Defense (Kyes) to the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 26, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is in reply to your letter of 26 June 1953[1] concerning planning for the defense of the Middle East in which you requested Defense Department views as to what form of Middle East planning arrangements we should now seek to establish under existing circumstances.

Your letter pointed out that, whereas the policy of the United States Government has been to proceed with planning arrangements on the assumption that Arab cooperation would be won and a Middle East Defense Organization established at a later date, the Department of State is now convinced of the improbability of effecting Middle East defense arrangements, which would include the Arab States, until there has been a significant political improvement in the region.

There is enclosed for your information a copy of a memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff dated 11 August 1953 which states, in substance, that planning for the defense of the Middle East is continuing both within the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and that such planning arrangements are acceptable for the immediate future. The Department of Defense concurs in these views.

Sincerely yours,

ROGER M. KYES

Memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson)

SECRET WASHINGTON, 11 August 1953.

Subject: Defense Arrangements for the Middle East.

1. As requested in your memorandum dated 15 July 1953, [2] subject as above, the Joint Chiefs of Staff submit herewith their comments and recommendations with respect to the letter from the Secretary of State, dated 26 June 1953, [3] concerning defense arrangements for the Middle East.

2. The Joint Chiefs of Staff continue to hold the view that allied planning for the defense of the Middle East should proceed regardless of whether a Middle East Defense Organization (MEDO) with Arab states participating is brought to fruition. However, since this view was last confirmed in our memorandum for the Secretary of Defense dated 29 July 1952, [4] subject: "Middle East Defense Organization," the trend of events in the Middle East has caused the Joint Chiefs of Staff to modify their views as to the arrangement under which such planning could best be accomplished, taking into account political as well as military factors.

3. Specific reference is had to the stalemate in the U.K.-Egypt negotiations concerning the Suez base issue and the effect of that situation on the Egyptian attitude toward MEDO, the lack of progress toward a settlement of the Arab-Israeli problem, and the absence of any encouraging results from the exploratory approaches made to individual Arab states other than Egypt. Additionally, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have taken cognizance of the current view of the Department of State that it would not now be desirable openly to establish an exclusively Western planning arrangement for Middle East defense in the face of Arab opposition, as expressed in the Department of State letter to which these comments are addressed.

4. Recognizing the changed conditions in the Middle East, and that "The United States should. . . Develop secretly plans for the defense of the area with the United Kingdom, Turkey, and such others as may be desirable" (Subparagraph 16a, page 8, of NSC 155/1),[5] studies looking to informal and unpublicized planning with respect to the Middle East have been in progress for some time. These studies have taken two forms: discussions through NATO by subordinate commanders of Commander in Chief, Allied Forces, Southern Europe and through U.S. commanders in the area with representatives of the United Kingdom, Turkey, and other interested powers; and unilateral U.S. planning studies in anticipation of possible integration of U.S. plans with those of the United Kingdom, Turkey, and others, as deemed desirable. At the present time these efforts are not sufficiently far advanced to enable the Joint Chiefs of Staff either to indicate the extent to which our plans should be integrated with those of the United Kingdom, Turkey, and possibly others, or to make recommendations concerning the appropriate channels for such integration of plans. Nevertheless, in order to indicate the status of present efforts with respect to planning concerning the Middle East, the following are noted:

a. The Joint Chiefs of Staff are now engaged in exploratory studies relating to various aspects of Middle East defense. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have previously advised the British Chiefs of Staff that, when these studies are sufficiently developed, they will be approached in regard to conducting U.S.-U.K. planning studies both on the overall defense of the Middle East as well as the defense of such limited areas as may be necessary to permit continued exploitation of petroleum of one oil complex determined to be the most economically defensible in terms of force requirements.

b. As indicated in the penultimate paragraph of the Department of State letter dated 26 June, informal and unpublicized studies in furtherance of planning for the defense of the Middle East area have in fact been initiated in NATO through a series of conferences under the aegis of the Commander in Chief, Allied Forces, Southern Europe. In the latest of these conferences representatives of the Commander, Allied Land Forces, Southeastern Europe; the Commander in Chief, Middle East Land Forces (British), and the Turkish General Staff met at Izmir, Turkey, from 18 to 23 May 1953. [6] Further conferences in this series, including one with representatives of the Commander, Allied Air Forces, Southern Europe; the Commander in Chief, Middle East Air Forces, and the Turkish General Staff, are planned. The objective of these meetings is to provide the participating commands with information necessary to initiate preparation of detailed coordinated plans for the defense of Eastern and Southeastern Turkey and the Middle East.

c. In an effort to avoid conflicts in planning for the use of Middle East facilities during the last two years U.S. military representatives have coordinated operating requirements in the North Africa-Middle East area with the British, and to some degree with the French. As a result of your memorandum of 8 June 1953, subject: "British, French, and American Military Operating Requirements in the Middle East and Mediterranean Areas," [6] the Joint Chiefs of Staff have approved U.S. requirements, and authority has been granted to hold further coordinating conferences with both the British and the French. Further conferences with representatives of these countries are being scheduled.

5. From a military point of view, the need for a MEDO in which all of the Arab states of the Middle East willingly participate has in no way diminished. Defense planning for the Middle East cannot be fully effective until there can be formulated a single combined plan for the employment of all indigenous forces in conjunction with forces contributed by the Western powers for defense of that strategically important area. However, as an interim measure pending the consummation of a MEDO or other suitable structure within which the equipping, training, and employment of all Middle East defense forces may be fully integrated, and having regard for the political factors involved, the Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that the present arrangements for Middle East Defense Planning are acceptable for the immediate future and are the most suitable that are feasible of achievement at this time.

The Ambassador in Egypt (Caffery) to the Department of State [1]

TOP SECRET CAIRO, August 30, 1953—noon.

271. Third RECNE meeting held Cairo August 28–29. Present: Caffery (chairman) Berry, Moose, Lynch, Russell, Bruins, Jones, Jernegan and Daspit (State), Paul (FOA), Sievers and Eveland (Defense). Summary record being prepared for pouching by September 11.

Highlights of meeting included:

I. United States military aid 1954.

(a) On basis assumption reported by Washington representatives that any possible requirements for Egypt–Iran–Pakistan would be met from reserve funds Title II RECNE accepted proposal whereby $30 million from subsection 202(b) directed to other Arab States and Israel.

(b) Agreed as much as two-thirds of $30 million should be allocated to Iraq and Syria with token programs in other Arab States and Israel and probably slightly larger program in Saudi Arabia (Jones, who did not arrive Cairo until after discussion this item dissents).

(c) Formula for preventing United States military aid being used for local aggression would be joint planning with United States participant. [Garble] believed acceptable to all receiving Near East countries. (Moose adds provided Syrian program large enough.) Suggest one MAAG to handle both Jordan and Lebanon if small size of programs justifies.

(d) ACSP pure propaganda document and can play no useful role our military planning in area except be possible source of language for use in eventual regional agreements. Setting up United States–United Kingdom–French–Turkish MEDO in Near East would confuse and irritate Arabs. Attempts seek combinations Arab States with Turk–Pakistan would be premature for present. Military aid program should be kept bilateral at beginning.

(e) RECNE recommends following timetable of action for all countries except Egypt which special case (see Department telegram 69 to Cairo): [2]

> 1. Joint Chiefs of Staff should proceed with military planning taking into consideration broad principles set forth above and presently available data.
> 2. At earliest possible moment, chiefs of mission should approach Near East governments informing them availability military aid. If Near East governments interested, United States Government would like send out small survey team for joint study of needs and determination items United States could supply. (Throughout negotiations United States emphasis should be on material, rather than dollars.)

TOP SECRET — CAIRO, August 30, 1953—1 p. m.

272. Other recommendations of third RECNE meeting held Cairo, August 28–29:

II. United States economic aid fiscal year 1954.

(a) RECNE took note of Department's objectives in requiring "belt-tightening" by Israel and gradually diminishing United States grant aid with reduction to $50 to 55 million fiscal year 1954.

(b) Preliminary reactions to apportionment as among other countries: Caffery wishes at least $25 million be available for use at appropriate time in resolution Suez base problem.

Moose feels $17 million maximum for Syria not unrealistic, but observes (1) Syrian interest in economic aid secondary to military; (2) we should do nothing discourage Syrians in their stated intent finance GHAB with borrowed money; (3) Euphrates development requires detailed negotiations Syria, Iraq, Turkey.

Berry holds present view that no special economic aid now needed in Iraq. Will take another look in light regional and other considerations and report directly to Department.

Lynch goes along with $10 million figure for Jordan.

Bruins states no present demonstrated need for special economic aid Lebanon. Decision as to United States grant component in financing Litani construction should be made soonest after completion phase II Point IV survey and Lebanon efforts finance with local and loan capital are known.

Jones urges significant United States grant aid program Saudi Arabia of magnitude several million dollars in fields water development, irrigation and roads, justifiable on grounds United States economic and strategic interests Saudi Arabia. Saudi Arabia program should stand comparison with those in other Arab States.

[1] Repeated to the Arab capitals, London, Paris, Tel Aviv, and Ankara.

(c) RECNE members unprepared comment on latest Departmental proposals regarding specific projects this time. (Exception is Egypt—Caffery goes along with all projects listed in TCA document.) Will review with economic and FOA staffs and comment directly to Department.

(d) Lack of enthusiasm for regional projects in general and highway proposals in particular. Haifa free-port with connecting roads unrealistic for fiscal year 1954. Syrians more interested in roads opening Jezirah than in communications with other countries. Iraq desires system putting Baghdad on trunk line, rather than feeder. Mission chiefs will comment further after more study.

III. Arab Development Bank.

General agreement as to value of idea, but doubts as to present prospects. Capital from oil poor states unobtainable. As for oil rich states: Iraq's revenues committed to development board for next five years; Saudi Arabia still chronically overspent and in any event prefers capital exports other Arab States on basis political largesse, rather than economic investment; Kuwaiur revenues fully employed in local development and relieving fiscal pressure on United States. Skepticism as to motives behind Arab League's proposal or Arab ability follow through. United States should watch and encourage this development but not count on it.

IV. Jerusalem. [2]

Department's proposal studied with interest. Doubt expressed by Caffery whether Catholic support for Article 1 (d) of Swedish draft resolution would be forthcoming since this tends confirm Greek Orthodox in their possession of certain holy places. Russell feels idea attractive and suggests (1) if put into effect Israel be invited renounce all future claims old Jerusalem; (2) care be taken keep USSR and satellites out of United Nations overseer machinery. View other members is that revived Swedish proposal would be viewed by Arabs as formal recognition Israel fait accompli and that we are better off with situation as now stands. Proposal worthy of re-examination in framework over-all attack on all outstanding issues between Arabs and Jews.

V. Jordan-Yarmuk Development.

Broad principle of unified development Jordan Valley for maximum refugee resettlement and greatest good to greatest number highly laudable. Caffery thinks TVA proposals could with some difficulty be sold to Egyptians as they now stand. Russell states Israel would strongly object, but TVA report represents only sound policy and should be implemented. Lynch states TVA proposals unrealistic in light current political situation and attempted payment would retard rather than advance United States objectives in area. Moose and Bruins have grave doubts as to political feasibility TVA proposals.

There is also hesitation recommend that United States take major policy step in light of highly conflicting engineering judgments as to technical feasibility as between TVA and TCA/Jordan. Feeling is that United States Government should be completely sure of ground technically before embarking on political course action. Among technical questions to be firmly answered are (1) suitability Tiberias as reservoir view evaporation and geological faults, and (2) firm opinion from Baker–Harza engineers on spot as to feasibility cost time of construction Maqarbn Dam. Baker–Harza study should forward as expeditiously as possible while more convincing data regarding Tiberias as reservoir should be sought from all sources including Israel.

VI. UNRWA.

RECNE took note of projected firm line of Carver report to United Nations General Assembly. [3] Agreed would be useful take further diplomatic steps convince Arabs relief has time limit and necessity for more expeditious cooperation on resettlement.

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson) [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 8, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of August 17, 1953, [2] in which you informed me of the concept under which the Joint Chiefs of Staff believe military aid to the Middle East should be administered. You requested that the Department of State set forth the political factors which should be taken into consideration by the Department of Defense in planning the execution of the first phase of the military aid program in the Middle East area.

The Chiefs of American Diplomatic Missions in the Arab States and Israel met at Cairo on August 28 and 29, together with representatives of the Department of Defense and Department of State, to discuss this question. [3] They came to the following conclusions:

1. The $30 million appropriated by the Congress specifically for military aid to the Near East (exclusive of Greece, Turkey and Iran) should be programmed as soon as possible for assistance to Iraq, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Israel, Jordan and Lebanon. If it should be decided that military grant aid to Egypt and Pakistan, or additional military grant aid to Iran, is necessary, these programs should be financed out of the sum of $50 million which has been tentatively ear-marked as reserve out of funds appropriated under Title II of the Mutual Security Act of 1953.

2. As between the countries which would share in the $30 million sum, something in the neighborhood of two-thirds of the total should be programmed for Iraq and Syria. A somewhat smaller amount, possibly in the neighborhood of $5 million, should be programmed for Saudi Arabia. A still smaller amount should be allocated for infrastructure in Israel, and token programs should be undertaken in Jordan and Lebanon.

3. Every effort should be made to initiate these programs as quickly as possible. As soon as the necessary decisions are taken in Washington regarding the general order of magnitude of programs to be offered to each country, the American Chiefs of Mission in the area should be authorized to discuss with the governments to which they are accredited the initiation of military aid programs and, if the response of the local governments is favorable, to arrange for the dispatch of survey missions to study the exact character of the equipment and training to be furnished each country. Following the report of the survey missions, the American Diplomatic Representative in each country would then undertake formal negotiation of the usual bilateral military assistance agreement.

4. As a means of increasing American influence in the countries concerned and of giving greater assurance that the arms furnished would be used only for defense against aggression, we should seek in appropriate cases to establish formal or informal arrangements for joint military planning between the individual local governments and the United States. This was especially recommended with regard to Iraq and Syria. It was not recommended that we attempt at this time to expand this type of bilateral planning into any sort of regional multilateral planning, although in the case of Iraq close coordination and probably even tripartite planning with British would be necessary.

I believe the foregoing recommendations are sound from a political point of view. If you concur in them, I hope the Department of Defense will take early action to lay down the general lines of military assistance to each of the countries concerned and will prepare for the early dispatch of survey teams, so that our Diplomatic Representatives may be instructed to open discussions as quickly as possible.

The Department of State will communicate with your Department at a later date regarding possible military aid programs for Egypt and Pakistan and a possible increase in the presently planned program for Iran. These will depend upon certain political factors which are not yet clear.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

CONFIDENTIAL ANKARA, September 17, 1953—noon.

291. Embassy informed by New York Times correspondent Hangen that in interview yesterday with Major General Ayub Khan, Commander Pakistan Field Forces, and Pakistan Defense Secretary Iskander Mirza, he raised question possible "northern Middle East defense pact". Pakistanis stated they favored such pact based on Turkey and Pakistan and probably including Iraq, but not Iran at present because too weak. They added, however, that they could take no action in this direction without go-ahead signal from US and that no word on this subject yet received from US. Pakistanis made clear US military and economic assistance would be prerequisite. Expressed view US has wasted too much time on Arab States and should encourage this new approach to Middle East defense.

Apparent throughout conversation that Ayub and Mirza preoccupied with problem relations with India and this major consideration in all their thinking. Foreign Office Under Secretary Birgi, in conversation with Hangen, expressed favorable personal reaction to idea of close Turk-Pakistan defense collaboration but "groundwork would have to be very carefully laid". He said Turks would have to be sure Pakistani objective was not to use them against Indians.

Hangen has not yet sent despatch and states he intends phrase it carefully to avoid possible embarrassment Pakistanis.

I am having private luncheon with Ayub and Mirza today and shall report further this subject thereafter. [2]

Next day Mirza returned to Karachi and Ayub flew to US arriving New York 27th for three weeks tour American military installations guest Department Army.[3] Nash told him he would see him Washington after he and Kyes returned Defense Department October 8.

Ayub and Mirza told me they were impressed with ability of Turkish training and attitude of American teaching staff many of whom they met during tour of Turkish installations that included visits to Fifth Armored Brigade, Signal School, Air Force School, Air Technical School, Communications School, First Army Headquarters [garble] Staff School and Cavalry School. They also saw some maneuvers including tanks and were impressed generally with Turkish military posture.

Ayub told me at private luncheon he had brought Mirza along with him to Turkey in event there should be some indication from Turks of an interest in Pakistani participation in Western defense scheme. The only Cabinet member he met was new Minister of Defense who did not impress him. He said Minister was obviously a stop-gap appointment who was holding down portfolio until after next year's election. He found no disposition on part of Turks to talk about substantive matters of area defense. He did not meet President, Prime Minister or Foreign Minister all of whom were not available at places he visited.

He had one criticism of Turkish attitude. He said he had not seen their mountain troops but he did have impression they trying place too much emphasis on armor which in his opinion would be of little use to them in event of hostilities except possibility in Thrace and would require adequate air cover. He thought use of armor on Anatolian Plateau without air cover was to make their forces there sitting ducks for Soviet air attack.

The Acting Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for Mutual Security Affairs (Nolting) to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Nash) [1]

MY DEAR MR. NASH: I refer to the letter forwarded to the Secretary of Defense by the Under Secretary of State September 30 [October 1], 1953, [3] which set forth various policy considerations involved in proposed programs of military assistance to the States of the Middle East. Among the matters discussed in that letter was the desirability of an offer by the United States to equip an infantry regiment for Pakistan, provided the Pakistan Government agreed to make such a regiment available for service with the United Nations Command in Korea.

As you know, General Ayoub, the Commander in Chief of the Pakistan Army, is now in the United States. In the course of his discussions with the Secretary and the Under Secretary of State on September 26 and 27, [4] he made a strong plea for United States military assistance. He was told that although it was not then possible to state the United States position on this question, we expected to be able to tell him something definite on his return to Washington October 15, following the completion of his tour of United States military installations.

It is therefore necessary to come to a prompt decision on the question of whether the United States shall offer to Pakistan a program of military assistance along the lines proposed by this Department. For the reasons set forth in my letter of October 2, 1953 concerning military assistance for Egypt, [5] I think the question of the ultimate source of funds to be utilized in such a program might appropriately be left open for the time being.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Nash) [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 15, 1953.

Subject: Military Assistance to Pakistan

I refer to my conversation with you on October 12th on this subject. [2] I have since that time discussed the matter again with the Secretary and General Smith. As a result of these conversations General Smith made the following points to General Ayub in his meeting with Smith and myself this morning:

1. It had been impossible for the US Government to fully work out a position on this subject prior to Ayub's return to Washington. While this was the case, Ayub should nevertheless know that high officials in Washington were at the moment attempting to work out a line of procedure that would be mutually satisfactory to the US and Pakistan.
2. The US does consider Pakistan as a true friend and we are approaching the problem with a desire to work out a program of military assistance to Pakistan which can start during this fiscal year.
3. We here are considering as a part of the package the equipping of Pakistan troops which might be sent to Korea although we have not made a governmental decision to approach the Government of Pakistan on this subject. We see certain possible advantages to such an initial step as it would (a) provide hardware and training quickly for some Pakistan troops, (b) assist us in our political difficulties involving assistance to Pakistan, and (c) be a popular move in this country which would better insure continued Congressional approval for assistance to Pakistan.

4. A survey mission would probably go to Pakistan to determine what direct aid might be provided this year and lay the basis for continued direct aid in the next fiscal year.

5. We cannot enter into direct negotiations with Ayub while in Washington as these are matters which must be negotiated between governments. Ayub's mission here has served in stimulating interest and providing ideas on which to form a governmental decision. The next step would be communication to the Government of Pakistan, which would be done as soon as the US position was firm.

6. Ayub should utilize his stay with further conversations with Defense and State officials to more completely explore procedures for arriving at eventual US–Pakistan agreement. It was suggested that a combined State–Defense meeting with Ayub might be desirable.

7. In the meantime it was essential to us, and probably to the Pakistan Government as well, that there be complete secrecy that explorations were underway here regarding US military assistance to Pakistan. The US would be greatly embarrassed if such leakage occurred prior to certain diplomatic moves it considers essential.

I consider it important for all United States officials concerned to bear in mind the extreme delicacy of our relations with India at the present moment and the necessity for maintaining complete secrecy until we are ready to give the Indians appropriate explanations regarding our plans for Pakistan. It is also important to consider that General Ayub is not officially commissioned by his Government to discuss military assistance. Although he is high in the Councils of the Pakistani Government, he cannot make decisions or commitments affecting political matters such as the participation of Pakistan in the Korean operation, nor does he have the authority to pass on matters affecting Pakistan's relations with India. Any negotiations or commitments regarding military assistance will have to be undertaken through normal channels in Karachi.

We have talked to the British about US assistance to Pakistan. We feel it essential to be in step with the British if possible because of their Commonwealth responsibilities and the more practical aspects of fitting US equipment into what is now essentially a British equipped army. They have promised us their answer tomorrow, October 16th, here in Washington, but it is almost a certainty that Eden will raise the question with Dulles in London. If for no other reason this point alone should delay our hand in making a completely firm commitment to Ayub at this time.

I understand that Ayub will see Mr. Kyes and yourself, General Ridgway and possibly others in the Department of Defense. It would be appreciated if you would undertake to brief all those concerned in your Department. In view of the time element I would appreciate as well being informed immediately if the substance of our remarks to Ayub this morning conflicts in any way with Department of Defense thinking. I should be glad to come to see you this afternoon if such is the case.

HENRY A. BYROADE

P.S. For your information, Zafrullah Kahn and General Ayub have not responded favorably to explorations made to them regarding Pakistan troops for Korea.

SECRET NEW DELHI, October 19, 1953—9 p. m.

654. 1. New Delhi Embassy appreciates possible need Pakistan participation in proposed MEDO and possible requirement United States military aid to accomplish this objective. This Embassy's present comment is directed towards weighty considerations bearing on method of furnishing such aid so as to avoid grave hazard to other important American objectives in South Asia.

2. In our opinion, an assurance by Pakistan such as that outlined in Department telegram 404, October 13, [2] would not be accepted at face value by Government of India in present context Indo-Pakistan relations regarding Kashmir. Even though accompanied by United States assurance of opposition to aggressive move by Pakistan, we believe Government of India would remain unconvinced.

3. We earnestly recommend re-examination method of supplying aid.

Consensus of senior officers of Embassy that Indian response to direct military aid to Pakistan will be bitter and vigorous and will color and perhaps change course of United States-India relationship for long time to come.

We therefore, strongly urge Washington adopt method of indirect aid to accomplish objectives in Pakistan. Department, of course, realizes United Kingdom accomplishing desired objectives Pakistan through unobtrusive means by quietly extending line of credit, enabling Pakistan make essential military purchases without risk of damaging inflammatory publicity.

We would of course tell Pakistan of our assurances to India." (780.5/10-1253)

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan) to the Ambassador in Iran (Henderson) [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 9, 1953.
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

DEAR LOY: In your despatch No. 196 of September 30, 1953, [2] you referred to Cairo's telegram No. 280 of September 3, [3] reporting that Nuri Said had told Ambassador Caffery that when the Shah was in Baghdad he had proposed a regional military agreement among Iran, Pakistan, Iraq and Turkey. You remarked that if the Shah actually made such a proposal he must have done so in a "moment of ebullience" and you went on to say that the Shah had not given any indication to you of a belief that the time may be at hand for Iran to enter into any such agreement. You added, however: "there is a possibility that if the Western Powers would undertake to modernize the Iranian Army, the Shah would show more interest in the establishment of an alliance among Iran, Pakistan, Iraq, and Turkey."

Your despatch happened to reach us at a moment when this subject had just been recalled to our thoughts as a result of working-level consultations with the staff of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. We had found very keen working-level interest in the possibility of just such a regional arrangement as Nuri mentioned, comprised of the same four countries. This grouping would be ideal for the implementation of the strategic concept they favored . . . . You will recognize this as the classic British plan which has never been embraced by our own Joint Chiefs. We are unable to guess whether the enthusiasm of the staff planners indicates that the Chiefs are finally veering around to this concept. The thought expressed by the Pentagon planners was that initially we should attempt to bring about a four-power planning organization along the lines of the moribund Middle East Defense Organization concept but without the direct and overt Western participation which that contemplated and without attempting to bring in any of the Arab States except Iraq. The ultimate objective, of course, would be a full defensive pact possibly with additional participation from states both within and without the Near East, but our military contacts in question thought that much could be accomplished toward the defense of the area without going that far.

[1] Repeated to the Ambassadors in Turkey, Iraq, and Pakistan.

[2] Not printed; it contained comments about an alleged proposal by the Shah of Iran for a regional military agreement among Iran, Pakistan, Iraq, and Turkey. (787.5/9–3053)

[3] Not printed; it reported a conversation between Caffery and Nuri Said. (641.74/9–353)

Having convinced themselves that it could be utilized to implement the strategic concept they favored, the Joint Staff working group thought we should concentrate most, if not all, of our available military aid funds for the Near East, in this and succeeding fiscal years, on strengthening Iraq, Iran, and Pakistan. (Turkey, of course, would get substantial help in any case.) They would propose to do this even if only three, or perhaps only two, of the four countries in question were disposed to enter into the kind of arrangement contemplated. In other words, they considered that joint planning even if confined to Turkey and Pakistan, Turkey and Iran, Turkey and Iraq, or any other possible combination of two or more would be a significant step toward an eventual satisfactory arrangement for the war-time defense of the Middle East and South Asia and one which we should support to the extent of our abilities.

I do not know how far this thinking has spread in the Department of Defense. We may have further indications within the next week or two since the Joint Chiefs of Staff are expected shortly to give us their views on the manner in which military aid funds should be apportioned in the area. On the part of the staff planners, it seems to have been compounded of a number of elements: (a) the changed situation in Iran and reports they had read of the Shah's interest in building an effective defense force; (b) the insistently expressed desire of Pakistan leaders for closer military ties with us; (c) continuing indications of Iraqi concern with the menace of the North and consequent disposition to co-operate with the British and ourselves; (d) the possibility which the combination of these elements with the elimination of the old Arab-based MEDO project seemed to afford of developing an organization which could be keyed directly to what they considered a viable strategic concept.

I need hardly say that in the abstract, the idea of the four-power pact appeals as much to the Department of State as to anyone in the Pentagon. It is directly in line with the Secretary's idea of concentrating on the "northern tier", which he formulated on his return from his Near Eastern trip last Spring. If the pact should be developed, and the Defense Department endorses the strategic concept which it would appear to carry with it, we would be provided with a solid basis for military programs to the region which is now altogether lacking. The modest military assistance programs which will be developed this year must be justified almost entirely on political grounds, and in the absence of more solid military justification prospects for future programs will not be too bright. The Chiefs have implied that they will be prepared to start a real military build up once we had a regional defense arrangement in being which would make possible joint planning of the Western Powers with the Middle East states. The difficulties of Congressional persuasion would also be considerably eased. Since we are now reaching a critical stage in the development of national policies concerning foreign aid, whether or not in the next six to twelve months there appears to be a political base on which to build a Middle East defense structure may be decisive in determining whether we ever attempt a military program of real significance in the Middle East. Putting forward at this particular time, however, does raise some serious problems for us:

1. It omits all of the Arab States, except Iraq, and likewise Israel. We have been counting substantially on military aid to the Arabs, especially Syria and Egypt, as a lever to improve relations and solve some of the pressing regional problems such as Jordan Valley Development and the Suez Base. Saudi Arabia, too, is very restive and is demanding military aid as a quid pro quo for the Dhahran air base and other items we need. Egypt and Saudi Arabia can probably be taken care of as exceptions on military grounds; that is, Defense will probably agree to allocating aid funds to those two countries as the price of getting specific military advantages for our side, but Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and Israel present relatively little military justification for assistance, and although we might succeed in securing limited funds for them this year, they would almost certainly be excluded from any future programs.
2. Pakistan (not to mention the others) would almost certainly be unwilling to join the pact unless she were assured of substantial American military aid, and this raises the spectre of strong Indian reaction. We may decide to risk this in any case even without a pact, but it is an important consideration.
3. If we attempt to bring about a four-power pact, there is a danger that this very fact will bring such heavy pressure from their own peoples and from other Arab States on the Governments of Iraq and Iran as to force them to pull back from their present very tentative overtures to the West, whereas assistance to them on a strictly bilateral basis would be accepted without trouble and even with pleasure.

Other difficulties can also be envisaged such as strong Afghan objection (query: Should Afghanistan be included in the concept?) and the inevitable Russian charges of "aggressive imperialist encirclement".

I am writing you this rather lengthy exposition and sending copies to Ambassadors Warren, Berry and Hildreth, in order to get the informal views of the men on the spot. I realize that little or nothing of what I have said is new to you, but I thought it might be helpful to set it down on paper as a basis for an exchange of ideas.

With regard to Iran, of course, the first question to be answered is whether the Shah and the Government would be willing and strong enough now and in the foreseeable future to risk the domestic and foreign repercussions of a public alignment with a Western-oriented group, even though that group would not be directly and formally tied to the Western Powers. The same question arises, though perhaps to a lesser degree, with regard to the governments of Iraq and Pakistan. Since it has a direct bearing on the answer to this question, I should make clear that in fiscal year 1954 the amount of aid which could be furnished to Iraq, Iran and Pakistan would necessarily be relatively small. As a guess, I would say that Iran might get a total of $20 million (including the amounts already earmarked). Iraq perhaps $10 million and Pakistan $15 to $20 million. If all went well, we would assume that larger amounts could be made available in succeeding years, the sums depending primarily on the military value received in the form of strengthened indigenous defense forces and increased military facilities for Western forces in time of need.

If it should be felt that political factors in the region made it feasible at least to plan for a four-power pact, the next question would be that of the timing and procedures to be adopted. When should the first overtures be made to the respective Governments? Through what channels? Should we try to get the Turks or the Pakistanis to take the lead . . ., while we lent discreet support in the background? Or would it be better for the United States to make simultaneous direct approaches to all four? How should Britain be brought into the picture? (It would seem impossible to leave her out altogether in a matter affecting Iraq and Pakistan.) Should France have any hand in the operation?

Many more questions of this kind could be posed, among them the economic capacities of the respective countries to support stronger military forces, but I doubt that it is worthwhile to take up space with them at this juncture.

It would be a great help to us in NEA if we could have your comments and those of the other Ambassadors concerned at an early date.

Please treat this letter as strictly informal and personal. It has not been cleared by anyone outside of our Bureau and is intended merely as a preliminary sounding and not a basis for action.

With all best regards and congratulations on the splendid job you are doing.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. JERNEGAN

The Under Secretary of State (Smith) to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 12, 1953.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand in submitting to the Bureau of the Budget its estimates of the funds required for military assistance programs in Fiscal 1955, the Department of Defense made no provision for programs for countries of the Middle East other than Greece, Turkey, and Iran, and that this omission was explained on the ground that since FY 1954 programs for these countries had not yet been approved, it was impossible to forecast FY 1955 requirements.

I am disturbed by the implication that there will be no request for military assistance funds for the Middle East in the FY 1955 budget until the FY 1954 programs are firmed. In view of the delays which have already occurred in the development of the FY 1954 programs, and the number of additional steps which will be necessary before these programs can be firmed, the effect of this position, given the planned schedule for completing the FY 1955 budget, would be entirely to eliminate military aid for the Middle East.

I am confident that the Department of Defense does not desire this result. In your letter of August 17, 1953, [2] you restated the concept of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which you informed us had been approved and adopted as the Department of Defense position, that military aid to the Middle East falls into two phases, of which the first would be intended primarily to establish a politico-military climate favorable for obtaining the participation of the individual states in planning for the defense of the Middle East, and the second would be designed to meet the estimates of requirements for Middle East defense made by some form of Allied military planning organization in collaboration with the Arab states.

[2] Document 147.

It is obviously impossible to predict now, while the general character of first phase military aid programs is still under consideration within the Executive Branch, what progress these programs will make in the development of conditions which will permit the initiation of phase two. We have, of course, given up hope of effecting in the near future the establishment of a MEDO in the general form agreed to by the Western sponsoring powers. There are, however, other potential arrangements which might prove both easier to realize and more effective for purposes of Middle East defense. For example, there have been certain indications recently that it might prove possible to interest Pakistan, Iran, Iraq and Turkey in a form of joint defense arrangement.

Although it cannot be said with certainty that the provision of United States military assistance will assure the ultimate development of this or any other satisfactory regional arrangement, it can be said that without United States military assistance it is certain that no such arrangement will develop. There will be other negative results of a failure to carry through in FY 1955:

1. Assuming that during the present fiscal year a Suez settlement is reached, the prospects of evolving some arrangement which would make the base available to the West on a long-term basis would be materially reduced.
2. The United States position in Saudi Arabia would be rendered more difficult and the possibility of securing additional rights at Dhahran air base would be further worsened.
3. Considering the encouragement which we have informally extended to Pakistan, the termination of military assistance to that country after a modest beginning in this fiscal year would leave us in a worse position than we were at the start. The political repercussions in the country would be extremely serious. At the least, we would have to renounce all idea of developing Pakistan into a centre of strength for the free world.

To avoid these negative developments, and to be in a position to further the positive political gains, we are confident we can register through the use of this year's funds, we believe that additional funds of approximately the same order of magnitude as those requested by the Executive Branch for FY 1954 will be required for FY 1955. This is a judgment based principally on political considerations. If in the view of the Department of Defense it would be desirable on military grounds to begin a substantial build up in one or more of the Middle East countries (including Pakistan), additional funds will, of course, be required.

I am informed that the advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff concerning the allocation of this year's funds by services among the several Middle East countries is expected shortly. On this basis it should be possible to form a judgment as to the general magnitude and character of the programs which might be contemplated in FY 1955. I am hopeful that as soon as these data become available the Department of Defense will develop on an urgent basis an estimate for submission to the Bureau of the Budget. If there is anything which this Department can do toward facilitating such a submission, or if there appear to be reasons why such an estimate cannot be promptly submitted, I would appreciate your advising me at once.

I am forwarding a copy of this letter to the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER B. SMITH

Memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense (Wilson) [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 14 November 1953.

Subject: Security Arrangements for the Middle East.

1. Reference is made to our memorandum dated 11 August 1953, subject: "Defense Arrangements for the Middle East" [2] and to your memorandum dated 16 October 1953, subject: "Grant Military Assistance to the Middle East." [3]

---

[1] This memorandum was an enclosure to a letter from the Secretary of Defense to the Secretary of State, dated Nov. 24, not printed. Referring to the Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum of Aug. 11 (attached to Document 148) the letter reads, in part: "In order to bring you up to date concerning the progress of this planning, there is enclosed herewith a copy of a further memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff setting forth their present views as to what type of defense arrangements should be considered at this time. The views set forth in this memorandum, in which I concur, appear to coincide with the views expressed in your letter of 26 June [Document 142]; but, due to the trend of recent developments in the Middle East area, go a step further." (788.5/11-2453)

[2] Attached to Document 148.

2. As a result of recent developments in the Middle East, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are currently re-examining the U.S. military position with regard to security arrangements for the area, including the proposed Middle East Defense Organization (MEDO) and the grant military assistance program for the Middle East. The recently reported interest of the Shah of Iran in increasing the defensive capability of the Iranian Army,[4] the views of the Commander in Chief of the Pakistani Armed Forces with respect to defense of the Middle East as expressed to the Turkish General Staff and to high officials of the United States Government,[5] and reports from U.S. representatives in Iraq regarding the recognition by the Iraqi Government of the Communist threat were considered.

3. The above developments and the continuing infeasibility of MEDO point up a possibility that from a military point of view, the time might be propitious for encouraging Turkey, Pakistan, Iran, and possibly Iraq or a combination thereof, to form a defense association. This concept would visualize an association of indigenous forces under an indigenous command advantageously located with relation to the current threat. It would also provide for the evolutionary growth of a defense organization which could logically develop in time to include other Middle East countries, India and Afghanistan. Not only would the foundation be laid in a strategic area, but there would be no dependence upon a satisfactory resolution of the Anglo-Egyptian and Arab-Israel differences.

4. It is almost certain that India and Afghanistan would react unfavorably to the estabishment of such a defense organization to include Pakistan if such a move involved direct military aid to Pakistan. It is felt, however, that if some method of indirect aid to accomplish our objectives with regard to Pakistan were adopted, it might be possible to find a satisfactory solution to the problem of defending the Middle East through more effective utilization of indigenous potential and less reliance upon tentative commitments of foreign forces.

5. In view of the foregoing, it is recommended that you transmit the substance of these proposals to the Secretary of State and request his early comments as a basis for further consideration of the matter by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Upon receipt of the comments of the Secretary of State, the Joint Chiefs of Staff anticipate finalizing their views on this subject for your consideration and possible

In this connection, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are considering the possibility of entering tripartite military talks at staff level with the United Kingdom and Turkey on the subject of defense of the Middle East. The Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that the proposals contained herein, after finalization as indicated in paragraph 5 above, will be appropriate for guidance of the U.S. members participating in these military talks when they are held.

WASHINGTON, November 19, 1953.

DEAR LOY: I refer to my letter of November 9,[2] regarding the thought being given to a possible defense arrangement among Iran, Turkey, Iraq and Pakistan. Further to that same subject, I enclose a copy of a memorandum dated November 14 from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense.[3] This was given to us informally yesterday and we expect to receive it formally in a few days with the endorsement of the Secretary of Defense.

As you will see, this memorandum constitutes adoption by the Joint Chiefs of the idea which I wrote you we had found at the working level. The only new note introduced is the suggestion that some method be found to provide indirect military aid to Pakistan in order to avoid adverse repercussions in India and Afghanistan. (Personally, I do not believe it is possible to work out an effective method of indirect military aid. If we decide to help Pakistan we shall just have to ride out the storm.)

I should like also to call to your personal attention a memorandum of conversation which I had on November 17 with the Turkish Ambassador here on this general subject. A copy is going forward through the usual channels. [4]

Ambassador Ward has just been here on consultation and I took the occasion to tell him about our ideas and ask his estimate of the probable Afghan attitude. He does not believe Afghanistan would feel able to risk joining up with any defense arrangement under present conditions and he thinks they would be considerably upset at participation by Pakistan. However, he did not feel that we need be deterred by an adverse Afghan reaction.

As before, I am sending copies of this letter to Ambassadors Warren, Berry and Hildreth.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. JERNEGAN

P.S. Since the Joint Chiefs' memorandum has not yet been officially transmitted to us and we do not have formal clearance to send it to the field, please treat it in the utmost confidence and do not refer to it in any formal official communication.

During next 36 hours, Ghulam Mohammed had extensive conversations, first with Prime Minister, Foreign Minister, and later with President Bayar, Prime Minister and Foreign Minister. This a.m., before leaving Ankara for Cairo, his next stop on his homeward journey, Ghulam Mohammed told me President Bayar confirmed, in presence his two Ministers, Turkey willingness to enter immediately into defense pact with Pakistani and Turks, further willingness to include Iran in a tripartite defense instrument, if and when, conditions in Iran indicate sufficient stability for Turks to support defense buildup there. Bayar told Ghulam Mohammed would expect United States to give signal when, in opinion, Iran in suitable condition be included in proposed arrangement.

Ghulam Mohammed said he then sounded out Bayar on his attitude towards Arab States and found Turks are completely unwilling to include any of Arab States in their defense thinking. Bayar told him, in effect, that if Iraq were to be considered, the result would be only to involve the whole Arab League, one by one, and interject the Israelite problem into the defense concept from which, in his opinion, it should be excluded. Bayar expressed view, if arrangement as suggested above could be entered into, then problems of inter-relations of Arab League States, as well as relations with Palestine might well be insulated behind a defense organization, and with passage of time, might well fall into the limited importance which Turks feel is all they merit. Some passing reference was made about Egypt, but Bayar was highly critical of Egyptian Government's action in expropriating property people of dual Turkish-Egyptian nationality. He was inclined to feel Egyptians and British might well worry out their relations without any live Turkish interest and reiterated view that if a defense organization could be extended from Turkey through to Pakistan, the significance of Anglo-Egyptian irritations might well be measured in the perspective of time.

Ghulam Mohammed expects arrive Karachi December 5, in time to meet Vice President Nixon December 6. He told me he intends to suggest to Vice President desirability of United States sending survey team to Pakistan to appraise capacity of Pakistan defense and potential contribution to Middle East defense, in light of her soldier's contribution under British commanders in Iran and Iraq, in World Wars One and Two. He said he felt a survey by a competent American team would be more immediately useful to him than discussion on specific amount of military aid.

Incidentally, for your information, some of my colleagues, including Egyptian, Iranian and Nationalist Chinese, are already gossiping about commitment to a defense pact as result of Ghulam Mohammed's visit.

The Ambassador in Turkey (Warren) to the Department of State [1]

TOP SECRET ANKARA, December 2, 1953—5 p. m.

566. Reference: Deptel 591, November 30.[2] Believe Turk attitude peripheral defense arrangements reported Embtel 557, November 30,[3] not only sound but sets practical limit to present possibilities along this line. I assume that in speaking of "Turk willingness to enter immediately into defense pact with Pakistan" Bayar was thinking in terms of limited arrangement consistent with NATO and along lines Greco-Yugo-Turk pact.

While Joint Chiefs four-power concept, eventually extendable, provides desirable target, efforts to secure early formalization would in my opinion jeopardize accomplishment our purpose. This seems obvious case in which to make haste slowly, starting with encouragement to Turks and Pakistanis to proceed with consultative pact and initiate joint planning, with view inclusion Iran when developments warrant. Arrival this stage clearly largely dependent ability Iranian regime establish control and stability and effectiveness US support in developing strength.

This course would unavoidably involve preparedness to move toward Pakistan in near future, at least to extent survey team requested by Ghulam Mohammed, and to contemplate later program direct aid, notably in provision sea transport essential to provide mobility Pakistan armed forces. It would also require consultation with British, though I would hope we could take lead and avoid active planning collaboration, in view Turk attitude. Meanwhile, small aid program to Iraq should soon indicate possibilities of:

(1) Developing some local strength there; and
(2) Loosening ACSP bonds now frustrating our efforts with Arabs.

Think we must realize that in long run peripheral defense arrangements would require some support in depth, especially Suez base. However believe this not presently urgent and if we do not show too much anxiety, eventual arrangements may well be facilitated by pursuit of line suggested.

PRIORITY

TEHRAN, December 3, 1953—11 a. m.

1229. Limit distribution. Re Department telegram 1263.[1] Reply dated November 23 to Jernegan's letter November 9[2] supplementing information contained Embassy telegrams 1102 and 1103[3] en route by pouch which left Tehran November 28. View slow pouch service summary follows:

(1) In recent conversations with Shah during which latter urged early decision as to nature Iranian defense forces we will support, his attitude was that until Iran has army capable of putting up some kind defense would be useless to discuss multilateral security arrangements. He did not, however, state as corollary that he willing undertake such arrangements if Iranian army built up, although that appears to be his train of thought. Two principal elements his thinking apparently are, first, Iran should be more on basis equality in military capabilities before seriously considering mutual defense arrangements and, second, combined strength of participating countries should be enough to discourage Russian aggression.

(2) Our recent proposals for revision policy re Iran and increase military aid not only for purpose making it possible for Iran later to undertake joint arrangements with other countries but also, and primarily, for immediate political and psychological reasons. Believe, however, it possible Iran will, in perhaps one or two years, be willing move in direction joint arrangements assuming (a) early oil settlement, (b) continuation in power of government friendly towards West which cooperates fully with Shah and which has widespread public support, and (c) steady though not necessarily spectacular increase in capability Iranian army.

(3) Here, however, we confronted with something of dilemma in light indication reference letter that increase in military aid to Iran (and allotment funds Iraq and Pakistan) might be predicated on regional defense arrangements in being which would make possible joint planning of Western powers with Middle East States. In effect Shah says he cannot consider cooperative arrangements until army improved; we would be saying we cannot build up army until defense arrangements concluded.

(4) Cost of additional military aid outlined in reference Embassy telegrams, main additional expense being fiscal year 1955. As Shah pointed out, if there no settlement of oil problem that would enable Iranians to do their part in maintaining forces contemplated, plans can be changed at later date when this should become clear. In other words he urges us now to act with optimism in order inspire optimism.

(5) Re specific question as to whether Shah and government would be willing and strong enough now or in foreseeable future to risk domestic and foreign repercussions of public alliance with Western orientated group even though that group not directly and formally tied to Western powers, future prospects this country are at this juncture so cloudy it would be impossible to give definitive answer. It clear, however, that even if Shah himself were persuaded it would be good idea, situation not now such that action this kind would receive the public support which would be required. Possibility change this atmosphere contingent primarily on assumptions enumerated paragraph (2) above.

(6) Meanwhile although present government in balance seems to be holding its own it confronted with number immediate problems the decision upon any one of which could cause grave complications. Public reaction to government's disposition these matters; ability of government to continue maintain security and effectively quell opposition; and degree continued cooperation between government and Shah, are points which will have heavy bearing upon very future of Iran. Iranian Government will thus be too pressed in immediate period ahead for it to consider at this time injection of another issue, i.e. mutual defense arrangements, which it can avoid and which at best would incur widespread internal opposition and new external pressures. Probably no real progress can be made in obtaining Iranian decision this matter until other problems more pressing to them are solved and resultant public attitudes determined. Even then any concrete action should be preceded by substantial period public orientation to need for collective defense measures and desirability of "getting off fence" in cold war, which would be entirely new departure for most Iranians.

(7) Foregoing bears also upon timing and procedures to be adopted. Situation Pakistan and Turkey substantially different than Iran. Believe it would be useful at proper time if Turks and Pakistani would, if not take lead in discussions with Iran and Iraq, closely associate themselves with any proposals which might be put forward, although fact that favorable action by Iran and Iraq would probably be predicated upon firm commitments from us in matter of military aid would seem to exclude our staying in background even if it should otherwise be desirable to do so. Understand from reference letter some thought being given to our supporting an arrangement between any two of four countries, and if we prepared do this it appears Turkey and Pakistan will be ready long before Iran and perhaps Iraq.

(8) Believe British must be brought into picture at early stage and certainly before any definitive discussions with Iran, Iraq or Pakistan in all of which they have particular interest. Unlikely arrangements this type could be undertaken without British cooperation and it would in my judgement be mistake to risk British learning even of preliminary overtures to these countries without our having talked matter over with them fully and agreed to policies and procedures.

(9) Same applies though to lesser extent to France who is joint sponsor MEDO concept which would be superseded by new proposals. It appears, however, it less essential to effect close collaboration with France in very early stages but that this should be done at some appropriate time before things move too far.

(10) Indian policies under Nehru undoubtedly will be unalterably opposed to participation by Asian countries in measures this kind. India likely oppose military aid to Pakistan whether or not such aid related defense organization. Unlikely of course Indian attitude would have much bearing on Pakistan decision. I am encouraged by comment we may decide risk Indian opposition to aid Pakistan even without pact.

(11) However we should not overlook importance which Iran attaches to India. Strong adverse Indian reaction could have heavy influence here. Evidence that Indian Ambassador here already has been endeavoring discourage Iranians from any idea of participating security pact. Also extent to which Indian attitude will influence British is a consideration having important bearing on practicability of proposals.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, December 24, 1953—4:06 p. m.

686. For the Ambassador. Decision on extension of military assistance to Pakistan has not as yet been made by the US Government. [2] Before requesting such a decision we wish to determine procedures to be followed in the event it is decided to go ahead. Conceivably the type of procedure that could be worked out might have a bearing upon the decision itself.

We think best way would be in form of support for some sort of regional defense cooperation initiated by states in the area. Believe this important both domestically and abroad to provide rationale for extension military aid programs beyond present geographical limits and to support our contention that assistance to Pakistan is directed toward defense against outside aggression and not against India or Afghanistan.

Recent reports from missions at Ankara, Baghdad, Tehran and Karachi seem to show that sole present possibility is to bring about bilateral Turk-Pakistani arrangement, which would however be open to adherence by others in future.

Urtel 557 November 30 [3] quotes Governor General Ghulam Mohammed as saying President Bayar confirmed to him Turk willingness to enter immediately into "defense pact" with Pakistan and further willingness to include Iran if and when Iranian conditions indicate sufficient stability. If Governor General's report correct and if he himself accurately reflects Pakistani views, there would seem to be no serious obstacle to early action by Turks and Pakistanis.

Unless you see objection request you approach Turks in greatest confidence without delay along following lines:

1. As Turk Government knows we have been considering program of military aid to Pakistan. We consider Pakistan has potential to make real contribution to defense of Middle East if assisted by Western Powers. However, there are certain obvious difficulties (such as Indian attitude) in way of military aid program and we have not yet come to final decision. We wish to consult Turks on this whole subject.

2. It seems to us that one way to minimize political repercussions and maximize Pakistani area defense contribution might be to link

US aid program with initiation of mutual defense arrangements between Turkey and Pakistan and any other states in the area which might be interested and acceptable to first two. This would show that intent of US aid is to strengthen area defense against outside aggression rather than to take sides in disputes within area such as those that exist between Pakistan and her neighbors. Early creation of regional arrangement would have further advantage of enabling a start on regional defense planning which is highly desirable from military viewpoint.

3. We understand Governor General Ghulam Mohammed discussed with Turks (as he did with us) possibility of Turk-Pakistani defense arrangement with eventual addition of Iran and Iraq and possibly others. We should be glad to know whether Turks are disposed to consider this seriously.

4. We assume Turks would not envisage binding military alliance which might conflict with Turkey's NATO obligations and go beyond present stage of Pakistani thinking. We believe, however, some looser arrangement (perhaps similar to Turk-Greek-Yugoslav pact), providing consultation and joint defense planning would be both practicable and useful. We would not contemplate participation by US or any other Western Power. Our part would be to assist such arrangement rather than participate as member.

5. We do not believe time has yet come for inclusion Iran or Afghanistan in such an arrangement. Similarly, most Arab states are too preoccupied with Palestine and disputes with West to be ready join anything savoring of Middle East Defense Organization, even without direct Western participation. We have however some reason to believe Iraq would not be unreceptive to defense planning, despite negative attitude of other Arabs. Iraqis have recently shown keen appreciation of Soviet threat through Iran and are pressing us for modest military aid (which we may give). We understand Ghulam Mohammed talked to King Faisal re defense planning and found sympathetic attitude. Since Iraq would obviously be important link in defense chain, it would seem desirable that any planning for regional defense arrangement should keep in view desirability of including her at some juncture. We would not however consider her participation need be a condition precedent to establishment of arrangement between Turkey and Pakistan.

6. In light of Turk views on foregoing, together with any other observations they may wish to make, we expect very shortly to review whole picture and arrive at final decision re military aid to Pakistan. If that decision is to go ahead and if Turks concur in general desirability of Turk-Pakistani defense arrangement as suggested above, we shall want to concert with Turks on tactics. We think it would be undesirable for US to take any public initiative. Either Turkey or Pakistan could lead off by proposing (to the other) exploratory bilateral talks. These might be secret at first but at some fairly early stage it would seem desirable that the two parties publicly announce their intention to negotiate. Simultaneously or shortly afterward Pakistan could make formal request for US military aid and we could make public favorable response based on idea of supporting collective security as exemplified by proposed Turk-Pakistani pact.

We expect in the next few days to advise British of our line of thought as outlined above but do not plan to say anything further Pakistanis until we have Turk reaction.[4]

Consider it important avoid any publicity at this stage re approach to Turks.

Referring to the next to last paragraph of telegram 686 to Ankara (repeated to Karachi as telegram 475), supra, it suggested that in view of the imminence of important decisions in Washington the Prime Minister should be advised of the substance of telegram 475 before his departure. (780.5/12-2953)

4. If PM asks whether this means we will not extend aid unless Turkey goes along you may say that this is not necessarily so but that you are sure the US will wish to look at the problem in light of Turkish reaction.

5. When final position reached we will of course wish to consult him further.

6. You may assure PM our awareness embarrassment because of delay and express regrets. Decision will be made soon as possible.

7. Please emphasize we are giving him this advance notice because he is leaving Karachi before we can expect Turk reaction. Would be embarrassing if Turks learned we had spoken to him at this time. You may assure him it is unlikely final US position will be reached before his return on the 12th.

FYI we are awaiting return of President and Admiral Radford to Washington and we hope to have matter taken up for early decision then.

Also FYI British Embassy informed substance Deptel 475 to Karachi and 686 to Ankara. [3]

Reported essence of Deptel 483, [2] to Prime Minister in utmost confidence this morning and he asked me to keep Governor General informed in his absence and advise Prime Minister in Dacca through our Consulate, important developments. On return to office found Governor General trying to reach me for private lunch because he worried about delay in decision. Knowing Governor General would hear news from Prime Minister at their afternoon meeting felt wise tell same thing to Governor General at lunch I had told Prime Minister lest I offend head of state.

Though I told both I was not free to ask their reactions because they were being prematurely advised of line of our thinking solely because departure Prime Minister both voluntarily expressed appreciation as well as pleasure and approval of line of thought as possibly relieving pressure between GOP and GOI and accomplishing even more than the original proposal. Prime Minister requested permission to tell Finance Minister but on my objection said he would tell no one except Governor General. Governor General said he had laid groundwork in Turkey and felt sure Turks would approve and hoped soon Iran, Iraq and Saudi Arabia could come in and since their rulers soon visiting GOP Governor General felt he could help encourage them if he were free to do so. I said I would keep him advised important developments as fast as I could but meanwhile utmost secrecy vital. I indicated probably Prime Minister be back before I could formally approach them for their reactions.

TOP SECRET EYES ONLY WASHINGTON, January 5, 1954.

Subject: Military Aid to Pakistan

At a meeting today held with the President [1] by Secretary Wilson, Governor Stassen and myself, the President agreed in principle to proceeding with military aid to Pakistan, subject, however, to our capacity to present this in a reasonable way, which would allay the apprehensions of reasonable people that we were trying to help Pakistan against India. The idea was that we would emphasize (1) that this was part of a regional security project being initiated by Turkey and Pakistan with other countries in the area for potential additions, and (2) that we would indicate to India that we would be prepared to extend military aid to India under the same type of agreement as was offered Pakistan. A memorandum for the President on military aid to Pakistan, dated Feb. 16, by Deputy Under Secretary of State Robert Murphy, reported that Pakistan would formally request grant military aid from the United States in the near future, and it had been agreed that we would immediately give a favorable response. 780.5/1-654

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 6, 1954.

Subject: British Queries Regarding Proposed Middle Eastern Defense Pact

Participants: Mr. Harold Beeley, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. J.C. Crawley, First Secretary, British Embassy
NEA: Mr. John D. Jernegan

Mr. Beeley had a telegram from London (which he thought had probably been drafted by Mr. Eden himself) requesting the State Department's "considered opinion" regarding certain aspects of the proposal to bring about a defense arrangement among Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq. They were as follows:

1. Does the Department consider that the defense arrangement between Turkey and Pakistan would have any military value, the two countries being so far apart?

I suggested this was a question which might better be directed to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I could only say that the Joint Chiefs, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense, had proposed that we attempt to bring about a defense arrangement including Turkey, Pakistan, Iraq and Iran and had indicated that even if Iraq and Iran were not included, an arrangement between Turkey and Pakistan would still have value. I thought the Defense Department considered that some coordination between Turkey and Pakistan would be useful because of their position at opposite ends of Iran. I also thought the Joint Chiefs had in mind that an arrangement between Turkey and Pakistan would make it easier to secure the eventual adherence of Iraq and Iran and it was my clear understanding that Pakistan was considered an important base for the defense of the Persian Gulf area.

Mr. Beeley then asked whether we thought the existence of a Turkish-Pakistani pact would in fact attract Iraq and Iran. I said we had several indications which lead us to think the Iraqis were definitely interested.[1] I cited the reported favorable reaction of the Iraqi leaders with whom the Governor General of Pakistan had talked during his visit to Baghdad. I also mentioned the frequently expressed concern of the Iraqis at the Russion threat and the recent inquiry of their Ambassador in Ankara regarding possible developments in the formation of a four-power pact. I reminded Mr. Beeley that Prime Minister Mohammed Ali of Pakistan evidently expected to have the Iraqis discuss this subject with him when Prince Faisal and Prime Minister Jamali visit Pakistan later this month. We also thought Iran would be prepared to join eventually, although its Government would not be ready to do so for perhaps another year or two.

2. What reaction does the Department expect from other countries in the area? (Mr. Beeley said he thought this had reference to the Arab States and possibly Afghanistan.)

With regard to Afghanistan, I said we anticipated an unfavorable reaction but thought it would not be too serious. If anything, it would be my guess that putting military aid to Pakistan in the context of a pact with Turkey would be helpful since the Afghans looked on the Turks as their friends and might reasonably be expected to count on Turkey to restrain any Pakistani moves against Afghanistan. So far as the Arab States, other than Iraq, were concerned, we thought the chances were better than even that the pact would exert a favorable influence, creating a desire to joint it.

3. What was our view of the effect on the area of the omission of the Western Powers from the Pact?

I said we thought this should make it easier for the States in the area, except for Turkey, to participate. We thought Iran, Iraq and even Pakistan would be more hesitant to join an organization which had a direct and public link with the West. One of the reasons that MEDO had never gotten off the ground was that there was so large a Western participation in that proposed organization. We thought, therefore, that it would be better this time to let the Middle Eastern States start out alone. It seemed pretty certain to me that in due course British and American military advisers would be sitting in with any planning group which might be formed and that this in turn could easily lead to a spontaneous request for formal participation of the Western Powers.

4. What would be the effect of the pact on Turkey's position in NATO and how would the other NATO powers regard it?

I said this was getting a bit outside my field, but we had proceeded on the assumption that whatever pact was created would be of the nature which would not conflict with Turkey's NATO obligation. It would go no further than had been contemplated under the MEDO proposal. There would be no binding commitments of any kind, merely arrangements for planning against contingencies, such as were now in effect between Turkey, Greece and Yugoslavia.

Mr. Beeley remarked that he gathered there was some concern in London lest the Pact increase rather than diminish Indian concern over American military aid to Pakistan. The Foreign Office appeared to think Nehru would be especially unhappy at having a defense arrangement which was directed against the Soviet Union brought right to his doorstep. I said we had thought of this possibility but believed that on balance the pact idea should make it easier for Nehru by clearly showing that our military aid was intended for use against the threat from the North and West and not for use against India.

Mr. Beeley then read me the final sentence from his telegram which was to the effect that Mr. Eden looked forward to discussing this whole question with Secretary Dulles when they meet in Berlin. I asked whether this meant that Mr. Eden did not wish us to take any further action until that time. Mr. Beeley said he had no direct information on that point but he felt sure this was not the case. He believed Mr. Eden realized that we could not now hold up our decision provided the first step we have already taken (the approach to Turkey) worked out as anticipated. He thought, however, that if any unexpected developments caused us to reconsider our plan, Mr. Eden would like to be consulted before we launched a new line of action.

At no time did Mr. Beeley or Mr. Crawley register any protest or objection to the plan we had adopted, although from the nature of Mr. Eden's questions and from occasional implications in their remarks, I sensed that the Foreign Office was not altogether happy.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of Turkish Affairs (Wright)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 9, 1954.

Subject: Plans for Middle Eastern Defense Arrangements

Participants: Turkish Ambassador
Mr. Jernegan—NEA
Mr. Wright—GTI

The Ambassador called, at his request, to be brought up to date on developments. I gave him a rather full summary of our thinking and action in regard to the provision of military aid to Pakistan and the creation of a defense planning arrangement composed of Turkey, Pakistan, and possibly other countries in the area. I concluded by saying that we had still not arrived at a firm decision on military aid to Pakistan and did not intend to do so until we have received a definitive expression of the Turkish Government's views. I thought, however, that the balance presently was in favor of such a program and that the ultimate decision would be favorable if Turkey was in agreement.

The Ambassador asked whether we had talked to the British about this. I said that we had done so, [1] but not until after we had made our first approach to the Turks. The British did not seem to be especially happy but had raised no objections to our proposed plan of action. The Ambassador smiled and observed he was sure the British were irritated because the scheme did not provide a lead role for them to play.

While indicating his general approval of the proposed course of action, the Ambassador suggested two possible difficulties. 1. In trying to bring Iraq into a pact, we would have to reckon with the fact that the Iraqi people, as distinguished from their Government, would probably be opposed. 2. Afghanistan would be very much upset and might adopt an unfavorable attitude toward the US and Turkey if she were not at least offered the opportunity to join any arrangement which might be forthcoming.

With respect to Iraq I said we fully appreciated the delicacy of the Iraqi Government's position and did not intend to exert any pressure. We would not make American military aid to Iraq in any way contingent upon Iraqi participation in a defense arrangement.

[1] See the memorandum of conversation of Jan. 6, supra.

We would leave it to the Iraqi leaders themselves to assess the advantages and disadvantages of joining such an arrangement.

With respect to Afghanistan, I expressed the hope that Turkish influence could be exerted to reassure the Afghans. Turkey could promise Afghanistan that it would see to it that the pact was not used in any way against Afghan interests. The Ambassador suggested that the pact itself should contain some language to show that it would not be directed against states of the area, such as Afghanistan and India, and that it should be open to Afghan adherence. He appeared to think that Turkey and Pakistan should even make an affirmative effort to obtain Afghan participation. I suggested that if this were done at the very beginning it might provide premature Soviet reaction, but the Ambassador did not seem to think this such a serious objection.

The Ambassador and I agreed that the Pushtanistan issue would have to be at least tacitly shelved if Afghanistan were to join in any group with Pakistan. In this connection he said the Iraqi Ambassador in Washington was optimistic that Iraq could play an effective role in adjusting the Afghan-Pakistan difficulties.

TOP SECRET ANKARA, January 11, 1954—6 p. m.

702. Re Embtel 699, January 11. [2] Following are principal points emerging from long conversation with Foreign Minister in connec-

---

[1] Repeated to Karachi, New Delhi, Tehran, Baghdad, Kabul, and London.

[2] Telegram 699, repeated to Karachi, New Delhi, Tehran, Baghdad, Kabul, and London, contained the full text of the English translation of the Turkish Foreign Office memorandum delivered by the Foreign Minister during the meeting described in telegram 702. The Turkish memorandum was an answer to a U.S. memorandum of Dec. 28, 1953, the text of which is in telegram 686 to Ankara, Document 164.

According to the memorandum, the Turkish Government's reading of the U.S. memorandum of Dec. 28 gave it the impression that the U.S. Government, while hoping an agreement between Turkey and Pakistan would contribute to the formation of an organization for the defense of the Middle East, considered the immediate aim of an agreement to be the possibility of providing military aid to Pakistan without arousing adverse reactions in the international field. The memorandum stated the Turkish Government was willing to do its best to help the United States provide military aid to Pakistan because of feelings of friendship for Pakistan, and also because such aid would increase effective resistance to Soviet aggression. The Government of Turkey hoped an agreement with Pakistan might create the core for a future organization for the defense of the Middle East, and suggested that the fact an agreement with Pakistan would be followed by American aid to Pakistan might be the principal factor in the ultimate attraction of such an organization to other Arab states. (780.5/1-1154) tion delivery Turkish memorandum January 11 re possible approach to Pakistan on mutual defense arrangement:

1. Memorandum contains full, frank statement of Turkish views intended only for US officials. Even Turkish Ambassadors Washington and London, while being informed of substance, are not receiving full text.

2. Re paragraph 6, [3] Foreign Minister urged that US make every possible effort to bring about agreement between present Iranian Government and British on oil question. Previous British failure to act decisively at right time had led to Mossadeq adventure and repeat failure would certainly have disastrous consequence.

3. Re paragraph 7 and 8. [4] For past two years Iraqi leaders have spoken realistically in private but Turks are uneasy about their unwillingness or inability to speak same way in public. If their convictions are sincere, as Turks are inclined to believe, they should have courage thereof. Until they do caution seems essential, but Turks are willing to try.

4. Turks stressed fundamental differences in their opinion—and particularly geographic separation—between Turkish-Greek-Yugoslav pact and nature of any arrangement which could be contemplated between themselves and Pakistan at this state.

5. Re paragraph 13, [5] Turks are anxious for our reaction to proposed treaty of friendship with Afghanistan. Considering Afghan present and prospective weakness, inclusion in any defense arrangement is a remote prospect. However, Turks have long had close relations with Afghanistan and would not wish to risk any weakening of Afghan position. They suggest that such a proposal might take some of the heat off Pakistan and at same time provide

[3] Paragraph 6 of the Turkish memorandum of Jan. 11 indicated agreement of the Turkish Government with the United States that the time had not yet arrived for asking the Government of Iran to join with Turkey and Pakistan.

[4] Paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Turkish memorandum referred to Iraq. The suggestion was made that the Government of Iraq might be receptive to an invitation to join Turkey and Pakistan eventually, but Iraq's adherence to the pact was not seen as an immediate possibility. Turkey desired to have the views of the U.S. Government on the matter.

Telegram 405 from Baghdad, Jan. 14, indicated agreement that the Turkish memorandum accurately described the attitude of Iraq. The Embassy believed the participation of Iraq in a regional defense organization was unlikely until the United States established a military assistance program, the Middle East political atmosphere improved, especially in respect to the Suez Canal Base problem, and provided the Palestine problem was not stirred up. (780.5–1454)

[5] Since Afghanistan occupied an important geographic position from the point of the security of the Middle East, and because Turkey had very close relations with Afghanistan, the Government of Turkey suggested it might be necessary to provide a written guarantee or even a treaty of friendship to Afghanistan, to keep that country friendly to Turkey and stop it from impulsive action which might allow expansion of Russian authority there.

a desirable alternative to present Afghan relation with and dependence on India.

6. Re paragraph 17,[6] Turks desire Department's reaction and further discussion their tactical suggestions, with particular respect to timing.

7. Re paragraph 18,[7] I stressed that this is an entirely new approach from that represented by previous MEC and MEDO proposals. Turks expressed both understanding and agreement.

8. Turks very concerned about leaks and widespread press speculation on this subject. They request consultation before either government makes any statement in this connection and desire to establish an agreed position as to when and what might be said.

WARREN

[6] The Government of Turkey suggested that it might be advisable to discreetly give information to countries like Iran, India, and Afghanistan before a general announcement of the Turkish-Pakistan agreement. The Government of Turkey was prepared to take the initiative and agreed that the Government of the United States should not openly do so.

[7] The Government of Turkey said it had no knowledge of the views of the other sponsors of the earlier Middle East Defense Organization to the aspect of the Turkish-Pakistan Agreement that might constitute a beginning for an organization to defend the Middle East.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 12, 1954.

Subject: Proposed Turkish-Pakistan Defense Arrangement

Our recent inquiries regarding the present status of the proposed Turkish-Pakistan defense arrangement have established the following apparent facts:

1. We understand that the President has approved the principle of U.S. military assistance to Pakistan, but not as yet the medium through which such assistance would be proffered.

2. The NSC Planning Board is scheduled to take up "South Asia" on January 14. It is probable that the question of military assistance to Pakistan and the means of extending it will come up during the course of the discussion.

[1] Drafted by the Deputy Director of the Office of European Regional Affairs, Joseph Palmer, and the Deputy Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, Andrew B. Foster.

3. Further action on the proposal to extend assistance through a Turkish-Pakistan defense arrangement has been awaiting the further views of the Turkish Government, which have just been received in memorandum form (Ankara's 699 of January 11).[2]

The Turkish Government's reply to our informal initiative is one of tentative approval qualified by the following considerations:

A. The arrangement should be even looser than the Greek-Turkish-Yugoslav Pact, because of the absence of geographical contiguity, strategic unity and NATO direction in the case of Turkish-Pakistan Pact.

B. Further study should be given to extending the arrangement to Iraq, although the agreement of that State to participate is considered doubtful.

C. Further study should be given to the reaction of third countries (India, Afghanistan, Iran) and to means by which adverse reactions may be mitigated.

D. Implied is the thought that the views of other of the MEDO sponsors, particularly the British, should be sought regarding the arrangement as constituting a beginning for the organization of ME defense.

The foregoing considerations raised by the Turkish Government impinge on concerns which BNA and RA have felt about this project. We have seemed to detect a lack of precision as to what the proposed arrangement eventually contemplates and an uncertain degree of attention to such aspects of the problem as the following:

1. Turkish Forces. Although the Department's telegrams on this subject make clear that it is proposed at this juncture that any defense arrangement should be confined in the first instance to consultation and joint defense planning, we presume that it is intended to move in due course toward commitments involving the employment of Turkish and Pakistani forces in their mutual defense and that of the other intervening states in the Northern Tier (i.e., Iran and Iraq). The analogies which are drawn with the Greek-Turkish-Yugoslav Pact would seem to bear out this interpretation. Since the Turkish defense effort is now being maintained at its present level only because of U.S. budgetary support, it seems clear that any commitment to Middle East defense can be achieved only at the expense of present NATO commitments or through further U.S. financial assistance. You will recall, in this connection, that the Turks had previously proposed that the U.S. finance the raising of six additional Turk divisions which would be committed to Middle East defense. It is difficult to foresee the source of any such assistance.

2. Extension of NATO Commitments. There appears to us danger that the smaller NATO partners will interpret any Turkish-Pakistan Pact as a further extension eastwards of NATO's commitments and that the present feelings of unhappiness about the Greek-Turkish-Yugoslav developing defense arrangements will be raised in somewhat more exaggerated form. While it will perhaps be easy to convince the smaller NATO partners that legally there will be no extension of their commitments through NATO, it may be difficult to persuade them that the contemplated arrangements do not raise psychological and practical problems. While this may prove to be a manageable problem, we should be making some preparatory diplomatic plans against the day when any announcement may be made. Allied to this problem is the probability of concern within NATO regarding the implications to NATO strategy of possible Turkish involvement in a conflict far to the east of any presently defined NATO interests.

3. The British Position. We wonder whether, in the implementation of this enterprise, sufficient consideration has been given to the desirabilty, in the U.S. interest, of close consultation and coordination with the British. We have in mind:

(a) The U.K. position in the area and the responsibilities the U.K. has undertaken for its defense.

(b) Our recognition that the British have a primary responsibility there.

(c) British treaty rights in nearby Iraq and Jordan, and the British interest in Iran.

(d) The fellow membership of Britain and Pakistan in the Commonwealth.

(e) The possible effects of an extreme adverse Indian reaction on Pakistan-Indian relations and hence on the strength of the Commonwealth as a whole.

We have endeavored to confine the foregoing list to what we conceive to be EUR interests and have not commented on such other factors as (1) the military rationale for a pact which omits, at least in the first instance, the intervening territory between the two countries; or (2) the degree to which extension of aid to Pakistan within the context of a regional pact will mitigate Indian reaction. (In this connection NEA maintains that the pact will lessen the adverse Indian reaction; an NIE study says the pact will not affect the reaction much one way or the other; and the British say the pact will enhance the adverse reaction.)

Should you find a suitable opportunity, you may wish to endeavor to assure that the foregoing considerations either have been, or are being, taken into consideration in proceeding with this project.

Mr. Byroade—NEA

The Secretary, accompanied by Mr. Byroade, called upon the President at 3:00 p. m. today to discuss the problem of military assistance to Pakistan. Admiral Davis joined the group near the close of the conversation.

The Secretary briefly outlined the recent exchange of cables with the Turks in which they agreed to take the initiative in the formation of a security pact with Pakistan to be formed in such a way that other nations, particularly Iran and Iraq, could eventually join. The Secretary stated we had reached the point where proceeding further would be inadvisable unless the US decision were definitely to go ahead. He stated that there were many difficult problems of tactics to work out with the Turks and the Paks and while these would be done in secret for the time being we should be sure of our ground. The Secretary gave the President again a general summary of his thinking in which he stressed the effect, now that Nehru had raised strong public objection, of not going ahead. He stated that in his opinion this one act would do a great deal to establish Nehru as the leader of all South and Southeast Asia and nations in that area would henceforth be reluctant to proceed on matters with the West without obtaining Nehru's support. The Secretary mentioned certain instances of the past where Asiatic nations had supported our position in defiance of India, particularly in the UN and Japanese Peace Treaty. [2] He felt that the attitude of these nations would certainly be affected if we should bow to India in this public issue.

In the general discussion that followed, the President stated that he felt we should proceed. There should not be any public statement, however, until after January 23rd in view of the Korean situation. He stated his concern at the situation in India and directed that every possible public and private means at our disposal be used to ease the effects of our action on India. He concurred in general with a draft statement [3] which had been prepared for issuance by the President at the appropriate time which would explain the nature of what we were going to do, and why we were doing it, in the best possible public light. He agreed that a letter should be sent to Nehru prior to any public announcement by the US.

essential points. Believe Turk view correct that proposed agreement should be initially limited to cooperation on matters of general character listed paragraph 9, and that it should be loosely drawn and capable of elaboration as developments warrant.[5] Agreement so limited would have desirable effect avoiding implication of mutual assistance guarantee which might extend obligations NATO countries under Article V NAT. Believe it also desirable that agreement should be so drawn as to indicate it is not concerned with local disputes such as those of Pakistan with India and Afghanistan.

Part two of two parts.

5. Department agrees with Turk view as to importance of tactics. Following actions appear desirable to complete series moves ending with announcement U.S. intention to provide arms Pakistan:

A. Advance coordination US-Turk-Pakistan plans.
B. Diplomatic preparation for announcement Turk-Pakistan intention hold discussions concerning mutual defense problems.
C. Public announcement such intention.
D. Following closely, on "C", Pakistan request for U.S. arms assistance.
E. Diplomatic preparation for U.S. announcement intention provide arms Pakistan.
F. Public announcement such intention.

6. Timing these moves most serious problem. Delay in any public announcement while extensive discussions involving a number of countries carried on would almost certainly result unfortunate leaks with damaging effects. To accelerate procedure to maximum extent following suggestions made:

A. Turkey to approach Pakistan in secret earliest to suggest talks with view reaching cooperative defense agreement of consultative and joint planning character. The result of this approach would be (1) to agree to meet for this purpose and (2) to agree on a joint communiqué announcing this fact. With so much preparatory work already done and seemingly there being agreement on what is desired a very few days should suffice for above to be accomplished.

B. We should be informed in advance in order that we could also discuss with Pakistanis the steps to be taken. At this time we would inform Pak PM secretly and in utmost confidence that decision had been taken to extend military aid within framework of a joint Pak-Turk agreement. Because of need for secrecy we would hope that Pak PM would not find it necessary to inform all his ministers of this fact. (U.S. desire for secrecy due to desire keep distorted press speculation to minimum in interval prior to issuance statement by President mentioned para 7, E below.)

[5] Paragraph 9 of the Turkish memorandum stated that the Government of Turkey did not consider a binding military alliance with Pakistan feasible or advisable, but expected to have an agreement providing for consultations, exchange of military information, and cooperation in the field of technical progress. In paragraph 10, it was observed that Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia constituted a cohesive geographic unit, whereas Pakistan did not constitute a geographic entity or strategic unit with Turkey.

C. Diplomatic preparation for announcement Turk-Pakistan intentions consult of course matter primarily for those countries. Iran, Iraq, India, Afghanistan should be informed impending Turk-Pakistan discussions. Department hopes that Turkey and Pakistan will be able to agree some appropriate form of assurance which Turkey might provide Afghanistan. Although Department would expect be informed as to what it is proposed say, does not wish to be consulted in advance. Also hopes that Pakistanis will feel it possible offer non-aggression pact India. Turks would approach Iraq along lines suggested paragraph 8 their memorandum. Might also be desirable for U.S. follow up this approach by discussing with Iraq implications our offer military aid. Will obviously be desirable for US as well as Turkey and Pakistan to inform the British generally of developments. At appropriate stage also desirable provide information the French. Believe it essential that Turks make statement NAC. U.S. will be prepared support such statement, and will endeavor enlist similar support from British and French. Except for consultation British and French, various approaches should all be made in very brief period, preferably same day.

D. Public announcement intention Turks, Pakistan consult should follow immediately above moves. Department hopes Turkey could give their Ambassador Karachi full power agree text of communiqué along general lines mutually agreed U.S. and Turkey in Ankara. Department prepared so authorize U.S. Ambassador Karachi. Department's views as to points proposed communiqué should include will be forwarded separate message.

E. Timing Pakistan public request for aid not fully determined, but should follow shortly after joint communiqué and U.S. public statement. Interval could be utilized for any necessary coordination on remaining steps.

F. Interval between Pakistan request for U.S. assistance and U.S. reply should be minimum consistent with appearance of reasonable deliberation. U.S. would plan diplomatic preparation with India, Afghanistan, and possibly certain other countries of area. Expect send Nehru personal message from President explaining action, giving such assurances as are possible and stating readiness give sympathetic consideration any Indian request military aid.

7. To carry out schedule indicated above will be desirable have consultation between U.S., Turkey, Pakistan on certain texts and between two of three powers on certain others. In Department's view, these as follows:

A. Turk statement on impending Turk-Pakistan announcement to hold talks on joint defense problems. (Turkey, US, Pakistan)

B. Joint Turk-Pakistan communiqué stating intention hold talks. (Turkey, Pakistan, US)

C. U.S. statement welcoming this decision. (US, Turkey, Pakistan)

D. Pakistan's public announcement of its request for U.S. arms assistance. (Pakistan, US)

E. President's statement of intention supply arms to Pakistan. (US, Pakistan)

In addition, steps in diplomatic preparation including possible Turk assurances Afghanistan and U.S. assurances India of mutual interest, and there should be exchange of information this subject.

8. Discuss above with Turks and advise their reactions soonest.[6]

9. Department now preparing texts for suggested points to be covered all above topics where U.S. listed as a principal. These will be forwarded soon.[7]

10. While preparations listed this cable probably automatically preclude, we feel it essential there be no publicity or public statements prior to January 23 in view of Korean situation.

11. Embassies Karachi and Delhi cautioned to take no action at this time on this message.

Editorial Note

On January 20, the Department of State sent five telegrams to the Embassies in Ankara and Karachi concerning the forthcoming Turkish-Pakistan agreement. Telegram 783 to Ankara, repeated as 547 to Karachi, offered suggestions for Embassy guidance in discussions with the Foreign Offices on the principal points that might be included in a joint Turkish-Pakistan communiqué on the decision to hold exploratory talks. Telegram 784 to Ankara, repeated as 548 to Karachi, presented a suggested outline of points which might be covered in a Turkish statement to the North Atlantic Council on the impending conversations with Pakistan. Telegram 785 to Ankara, repeated as 549 to Karachi and 857 to New Delhi, transmitted a proposed statement for the President to issue if a favorable decision on military aid to Pakistan were made after the announcement of Turkish-Pakistan consultation. Telegram 786 to Ankara, repeated as 550 to Karachi and 858 to New Delhi, transmitted a proposed statement for the Secretary of State to issue, welcoming the decision of Turkey and Pakistan to hold talks on joint defense problems.

Telegram 787 to Ankara, repeated as 551 to Karachi and 859 to New Delhi, transmitted the draft of a personal message from President Eisenhower to Prime Minister Nehru in the case of a favorable United States decision on military aid to Pakistan. It ended by saying that the message would be delivered a day or two before the public answer to Pakistan and stressed the fact that the message was only a draft sent to the Embassy for suggestions. Documentation is in Department of State file 780.5.

TOP SECRET PRIORITY ANKARA, January 21, 1954—11 p. m.

747. Reference my telegram 733 January 19. [2] In meeting with Foreign Minister and Under Secretary Birgi late this afternoon, Turks expressed full agreement all main points Department telegram 773 and promised text reply tomorrow. [3] Turks prepared move immediately. Birgi summarized Turkish views as follows:

1. Complete agreement with US views re agreement with Pakistan and will draft accordingly. Will instruct Ambassador Karachi initiate talks with Pakistanis and agree text communiqué in consultation Hildreth. (Department telegram 783 [4] not received in time inform Turks our views re text today.) Turks feel word "defense" should be avoided in title agreement and will seek suitable phraseology as in case tripartite pact.

2. Agree on proposed series moves ending with US announcement intention extend military aid Pakistan, and on need utmost secrecy especially early stages.

3. Reference US statement welcoming Turkish-Pakistani communiqué, Turks urge desirability avoid impression US instigation. They have the advance draft.

4. Turks agree timing needs careful coordination. They propose approach Iraq on basis outlined Foreign Office memorandum January 11 (Embassy telegram 699). [5] Turkish Ambassador Baghdad will present Turkish-Pakistani initiative in light invitation to Iraqis to join or simply as information according receptivity shown by Jamali; in any event making clear Turks and Pakistanis are going ahead.

5. In informing Afghans, Turks will explain nature agreement emphasizing it in no way changes Turkish position impartiality in Pushtoonistan question. Turks will offer written assurances if desired. Telegram from Turkish Ambassador Kabul just received reports conversation with Afghan Foreign Minister in which latter clearly intimated desired Turks act as go-between seek US military aid. Turks feel this démarche offers interesting possibility obtain eventual Afghan cooperation. Afghan Foreign Minister referred inter alia to impossibility accepting any military aid from USSR. Yesterday Afghan Ambassador here came to see me and referring reports defense arrangement involving Turkey, Pakistan and perhaps Iraq and Iran, asked if we intended leave Afghanistan "out in cold on other side".

6. Turkish Ambassador Tehran will inform Iranians of Turkish-Pakistani talks without any reference possible Iranian participation proposed agreement.

7. Turkish Chargé at New Delhi will merely inform Indians, leaving it to US and Pakistan offer further explanations and assurances.

8. Turks agree it important fully inform British and French soonest and seek their cooperation and advice in presentation to NAC. Department's views this subject received in time present at today's meeting (Department telegram 784).[6] Foreign Minister indicated general agreement and promised immediate study. Turks indicated, however, they had envisaged making statement to NAC immediately after Turkish-Pakistani communiqué rather than before. Expressed fear otherwise fairly complicated timing various diplomatic approaches might be upset.

9. Turks entirely agree desirability full advance consultation US-Turkish-Pakistan Governments on texts indicated Department telegram 773.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Bonbright) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 23, 1954.

Subject: Turkish-Pakistan Pact

In view of the rapid pace developing in plans pertaining to prospective exploratory talks between Turkey and Pakistan and relative United States military aid, there are several aspects of the matter which EUR believes should be given urgent attention.

EUR's immediate interest in these developments is to avoid unnecessary friction with our principal allies and among the smaller NATO members. Such difficulties, we believe, can be minimized, if a satisfactory understanding is achieved among the United States, United Kingdom and France. If all three support the arrangements and the Turkish presentation in the NAC, there is no reason to believe any unmanageable problems will arise. Thus EUR believes that every effort should be made to assure that the timing of steps now being planned, such as presentation to NAC by Turkey, press communiqués, President's statement, etc., should take this contingency into account.

Because of her previous association in the sponsorship of MEDO and because of her basic desire to maintain a position as a great power entitled to consultation generally in global matters, and especially in the Middle East, France may seek assurances of future consultation on developments in this area as a condition for speaking in support of the Turkish statement in the NAC at this stage. In fact, if this question is raised and not resolved to France's satisfaction, the latter might well combine with the British in an effort to assure consistency between any plans which might develop from Turkish-Pakistan talks and their own interest in the area.

British support is even more important because (1) Pakistan is a member of the British Commonwealth with all that implies; (2) British interests and responsibilities in the area; and (3) if understanding is not reached with the British, the latter might well combine with the French in demanding closer association.

If the United Kingdom and France were both to refrain from supporting the Turkish statement in NAC, and from favorable public comment on the proposed arrangement, other NATO members and the world at large would immediately sense disagreement among the three countries, especially between the United States and the United Kingdom.

[1] Drafted by Palmer and Adair, and cleared by WE, BNA, and RA.

Against this background, EUR suggests the following steps:

1. The United Kingdom and France should be informed as soon as possible of the various moves which we have in mind:

> (a) the proposed statement by the Secretary on the Pact (Deptel 786 to Ankara); [2]
> (b) the proposed statement by the President on military aid to Pakistan (Deptel 785 to Ankara); [2]
> (c) the fact that the President intends to send a personal message to Nehru, together with a description of the main elements of the message (Deptel 787 to Ankara). [2]

2. It could be made clear to the British and French that they are only being informed of (not consulted about) the military aid aspect of the problem (1(b) and (c) above), since this is primarily a bilateral arrangement between the United States and Pakistan. [3]

3. With respect to the Pact, however, we would urge the British (and perhaps less importantly the French) to make a public statement more or less paralleling 1(a) above.

4. We would urge concerted action by the U.S., U.K. and France in the NAC, with each supporting in separate statements the proposed Turkish-Pakistan exploratory talks. We should avoid a U.S.-U.K.-French tripartite statement in the NAC, since this would tend to cast the prospective Turkish-Pakistan arrangements in the character of successor to the deceased MEDO project. It would also tend to cast U.S.-U.K.-France in the role of sponsors of the new arrangements and to give France a basis for asserting the right of consultation or participation in the future.

EUR also has the following specific comments on Deptels 785, 786 and 787 to Ankara:

1. The following statement is made in the fourth paragraph of the suggested draft letter from the President to Nehru: "We . . . have admired the effective way your Government has taken over from the British the direction of your military establishment." We feel the British may take a second or third reading of this. Though undoubtedly not intended by the drafters, a Britisher might interpret the remark as a pat on India's back for expelling the British Raj.

2. On the question of base rights, we note the following statements:

[2] Not printed, but see Document 174.

[3] Telegram 758 from Ankara, Jan. 23, not printed, reported that the Turks had given the British Embassy general background on developments, and had expressed the view that the French should also be informed. (780.5/1-2354)

(a) in the draft letter from the President—"Many statements have been made . . . that we are obtaining base rights in Pakistan . . . ."

(b) in the proposed White House press release—"it has been suggested that the United States may ask for base rights, etc. . . ."

These statements are followed by denials. We wonder whether the present wording may create difficulties for us in future in the event we should require bases there. We suggest some such wording as "the United States has not requested base rights." [4]

[4] A memorandum by Byroade to Bonbright, dated Jan. 26, answered that most of the points mentioned in this memorandum were being taken care of. The British had been brought up to date, and the Department of State was advising the Turks to inform the French in Ankara and, with regard to NATO, to make a statement at the same time that India, Afghanistan, and Iraq were informed. With reference to the suggestion on base rights, Ambassador Hildreth had recommended that the Department delete the reference to bases in the President's statement, and that would be done. TOP SECRET ANKARA, January 25, 1954—6 p. m.

759. Berlin for the Secretary. [2] British Chargé this morning called Under Secretary Foreign Office Birgi to say he had telegram from London referring information received by Foreign Office that Turkish and Pakistani Governments would announce negotiations for defense agreement within three days. Birgi replied this clearly incorrect for two reasons: (1) No "defense" agreement in question, but rather agreement for consultation and exchange information as he had previously informed British Chargé; (2) any announcement certainly not within three days. To Chargé's query when announcement might be expected Birgi reiterated earlier statement to him last week that Turks were disposed move fast as possible, but could give no estimate on timing. Chargé inquired insistently if Turks would not wait for observations British Government expected shortly before proceeding further. Birgi explained Turkish Government would naturally welcome any comments British Government wished make and give them careful consideration, but did not promise hold up action in meantime.

[2] The Secretary of State was in Berlin for the Four-Power Conference.

In conversation with Foreign Office Under Secretary last Friday British Chargé enumerated various reasons in favor delaying conclusion Turkish-Pakistani agreement:

> (1) Unfortunate effect on Berlin talks with Soviets; (2) violent Indian reaction, which placed British in difficult spot from Commonwealth point of view; (3) desirability inclusion "Western Powers" in any agreement.

Birgi in reply summarized views Turks and ourselves in favor proceeding soon as possible on basis regional Turkish-Pakistani initiative. He noted again that time of announcement not yet determined and may not occur until Berlin conference is over.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 26, 1954—4:20 p. m.
PRIORITY

816. Limited distribution. Part I of II parts. Re Embtel 755. [2]

1. Department considers that US-Turk agreement on all significant points has now been reached and that Turks might now act immediately inform Pakistanis as proposed sub para 4(a) ref tel. US Ambassador Karachi hereby instructed consult with his Turkish colleague, and following Turk approach should inform Pakistan of US support Turk-Pakistan arrangement and in confidence of US decision supply military assistance Pakistan in framework of Pak-Turk agreement.

2. Believe full US-Turk agreement already recorded on general nature various moves proposed Para 5, Deptel 773, [3] with two exceptions:

> A. Turks suggest possibly better for US Secretary of State not to issue public statement welcoming Turk-Pakistan arrangements. Department shares desire of Turks that US role in these developments should be minimized and accordingly agrees preferable that US reaction be indicated in Secretary's press conference.
> B. Nature of Turk approach to Afghanistan. This subject of Part II this message.

[3] Document 173.

3. Re timing of moves, Department offers following comments:

A. Assume that Turk approach to Pakistan will be made during present week. As Turks suggest, speed with which agreement can be reached on date for issuance Turk-Pakistan communiqué will depend on degree to which Pakistan government position already develped. Once this date is set diplomatic preparation will, of course, be keyed to it. Turk view that approaches to Iran, India, Afghanistan should take place 2 or 3 days in advance communiqué entirely acceptable.

B. Re Turk approach Iraq, agree that this might be undertaken shortly after agreement reached with Pakistan. Note that US will be informed prior such approach.

C. Re consultaton with France, agree French should be informed by Turks at once. Assuming this will have been accomplished before January 28, Department will follow up with approach to French Embassy Washington that date.

D. Re presentation NATO, Department considers it would be preferable if Turks felt able make statement NAC at approximately same time as diplomatic approaches to Iran, Afghanistan and India—that is two or three days prior communiqué. Believe NATO members would appreciate this much advance notice. In event this not feasible, believe statement should at least be made same day.

4. A. Re form of arrangement between Turkey and Pakistan it is, of course, for Turks to decide precise form agreement may appropriately take. Department wishes recall, however, that when Turks originally consulted point was made that best way for US give military aid Pakistan would be in form of support for some form of regional defense cooperation initiated by states in area (Deptel 686 to Ankara).[4] It was Department's understanding that Turks agreed to and endorsed this proposal (Ankara's 699).[5]

B. With Pakistan request for military aid following closely on Turk-Pak communiqué re talks and US reply pegged to this, Department considers that defense implications of arrangements will be clear. Although Department has no objection to avoidance term "defense" and placing main emphasis agreement in political field, hopes that Turks will at least feel able use phrase "security co-operation agreement" which appears para. 1 their memo (Embtel 755). This would be helpful in presentation of case for US arms assistance. We prepared, of course, accept Turkey's position this matter but would welcome opportunity making further comment when draft agreement available.

5. Draft text public statements will be revised to take into account final position.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Embassy in Turkey [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 26, 1954—4:21 p. m.
PRIORITY

817. Limited distribution. Part II of II Parts.

7. Department very much aware Afghan problem and appreciate initiative Turkey this regard. As basis reaching understanding believe Turks should have rundown our present thoughts. Afghan as noted in vulnerable position and subject to pressure from USSR. This illustrated recently by Afghan's dropping proposed contract with French firm re oil development in north because of USSR protest. Part of Afghanistan north of Hindi-Kush especially vulnerable.

8. Strong Soviet reaction and protest would be more firmly based than usual, since they might invoke Afghan-Soviet Treaty of 1931. This document provides (Article 2):

> "Each Contracting Party undertakes not to be a party to any alliances or agreements of a military or political character with one or more Powers which might be directed against the other Contracting Party or any financial or economic boycott or blockade directed against the other Contracting Party.

9. Afghan interest obviously related to amount and timing of aid US might give. Should be pointed out that problem would have to be studied throughout US executive agencies and that considerable delay might ensue before any decision reached. Assuming favorable decision reached, funds which might be made available for Afghan program would be very limited. Situation this years MDAP budget very tight and budget for 1955 already submitted Congress includes no provision for Afghanistan.

10. On basis these considerations, seems questionable that benefits which might flow to Afghanistan under possible program of US military aid would be sufficient to compensate for difficulties and risks involved. Would appreciate estimate of Turks in this regard.

11. On other hand Department very sympathetic Afghans need for help and desires avoid impression of cold-shouldering them. Department has under active consideration Afghan request for grant of 20 thousand tons wheat and hopes give favorable reply. Ex-Im Bank has formal request for new loan for development Helmand Valley, road improvement and certain other projects on which consideration being expedited. Foreign aid budget fiscal 1955 has provision for continued grant economic aid and it is hoped that funds will be appropriated for program somewhat above level now in effect.[2]

12. Although on balance Department considers it would be unwise encourage Afghan request US military aid, Turk proposed approach (last para of 4 in sub C(d)) otherwise seems excellent. If at later date Turk-Pakistan arrangement begins attract adherence of other countries in the area, US would be prepared consider requesting Congress for funds to broaden base of its support. If Afghanistan among such additional adherents, its claim would be considered along with others.

13. If Turkey proposes agreement with Afghanistan similar to one with Pakistan, this might prove embarrassing to US at this time since we expect to use Pak-Turk agreement as framework for Pakistan military aid. Because of this believe it would be better if Turkey would make any agreement called for of different character. Turkey might wish consider adding to its approach suggestion it willing consider expanded training program for Afghan military personnel in Turkey.

Editorial Note

Telegram 553 from Karachi, January 25, described a United Press despatch carried in Karachi papers on January 24 which reported the United States Government was not expected to make an announcement on arms aid to Pakistan until after the visit of Turkish President Bayar to the United States. The despatch then outlined "most information on Turk participation received here in Department's Top Secret communications. Embassy considers it not only most unfair but exceedingly damaging to Embassy-Pakistan relations that despite Turk request for 'utmost secrecy' American press should be able print such information from 'highly reliable sources' and we unable give one of principal participants, GOP, even inkling status of negotiations."

Telegram 573 to Karachi, January 25, repeated as 808 to Ankara and 878 to New Delhi, reported the Department of State had not seen the United Press story but expressed regret that it had embarrassed the Embassy. It said the announcement of United States aid was not related to Bayar's visit and authorized the Embassy to discuss the matter of the Turkish-Pakistan agreement and United States aid to Pakistan with the Prime Minister and Governor General of Pakistan in general terms, stressing the importance of keeping secret the United States part in any agreement between Turkey and Pakistan.

Telegram 578 to Karachi, January 25, repeated as 812 to Ankara, requested the Embassy to express the Department of State's serious concern and embarrassment over press speculation on Middle East defense and arrangements between Turkey and Pakistan and other states. "Since rumor started impossible control speculation by press which has always been acutely interested any defensive move in that part of the world. U.S. Government doing its best reduce press play but feels distortions cannot be corrected until positive steps can be announced and the quicker this stage reached the better." Telegram 589 to Karachi, January 26, repeated as 818 to Ankara and 890 to New Delhi, reported a New York Times story of January 26 which stated Turkey and Pakistan were negotiating an agreement for military, economic, and cultural cooperation that might be announced during Bayar's visit. The story also reported the United States would not be a party to the agreement, but was expected to offer military aid after its conclusion. The Department of State was replying "no comment" to public inquiries. Documentation is in Department of State file 780.5.

The Ambassador in Iraq (Berry) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET BAGHDAD, January 26, 1954—5 p. m.

424. When I called on Prime Minister Jamali last evening prior my departure Amman, I congratulated him on his recent hard-hitting statements against communism and on his efforts to build an anti-Communist propaganda machine in Iraq.

Prime Minister stated he hoped to do more than just fight communism. He hoped to move to an open and avowed pro-Western campaign just as soon as he had "something in mind" to present to Iraqi public opinion as a concrete gesture of Western friendship. By this he was referring primarily to United States military assistance. Even one of the leading oppositionists in Parliament, ex-Defense Minister Sadiq Al-Bassam, who in public is rabidly anti-Western, is privately urging Jamali to accept United States military aid and to come out for the West.

[1] Repeated to Karachi, Ankara, Tehran, Cairo, Beirut, London, Amman, Jidda, Tripoli, Tel Aviv, New Delhi, and Paris.

Somewhat to my surprise Jamali voluntarily implied that he would study sympathetically any proposals that might be submitted to him as regards a military pact with Turkey or Pakistan. He said that while in Egypt he had sounded out Egyptian leaders regarding their attitude toward Iraqi acceptance of United States military aid. The Egyptians had replied that they had no objections but at the same time were apprehensive lest the Egyptian position on the Suez base question be adversely affected by Iraq's adhering to military arrangements with Turkey and Pakistan prior to an Anglo-Egyptian agreement. Jamali said he obliquely replied that he would never do anything to prejudice Egypt's position "but if and when Iraq considers any pacts Egypt will be fully informed about it."

Jamali states he still intends visit Pakistan but exact time departure uncertain because Royal family once again considering state visit. His own plans will depend on theirs.

Jamali is also considering sending parliamentary mission to Turkey in order that Iraqi legislators can learn at first hand benefits Turkey has derived from United States aid.

Jamali reiterated once again, however, that all his good intentions would come to naught if the United States stirred up the Palestine question. When I asked him regarding Arab counterproposals to Jordan plan he said they were being developed adding that he would raise no objections to a second Johnston area visit and would not object to Mr. Johnston coming to Iraq.[2] However, if we were asking him for his frank opinion about the advisability of such a visit, he would be obliged to counsel against it.

Other aspects of the conversation will be forwarded to the Department by despatch.

TOP SECRET NIACT KARACHI, January 26, 1954—8 p. m.

561. Just returned from tea at Governor General's his request. Speech defect make impossible catch all comments. Alternating between bitterness and apology for plain speaking, he bitterly assailed United States for an hour for the humiliation, embarrassment and awkward personal position in which United States Government placed him. Every day he and his people read harangues by and inspired by Nehru and plans for disposing of GOP as though it were a pawn on a chessboard, while he because he is neither assured of United States decision nor of their plans is not in position to say anything. Travelling reporter Mowrer tells him today ten times as much information apparently direct from State Department as he or his government have heard. On verge of writing his friend Turkish president declaring he is neither beggar nor pawn. May still do so.

I told Governor General appreciated his awkward position and had pointed it out to Department, but his summons gave me reason for urgent cable and I would report back whatever I could before end of week, even if nothing. Told him personally I felt favorable decision coming some time but he not to be denied telling how badly he had been used. He said situation developing so that he might have difficulty getting cooperation his government. Has not been approached by Turks nor US and daily humiliated by press reports. [2] When on his visit to States was assured his talks with Department officials and others would be kept entirely secret. Bitterly resented Swinton's reference 25 million, stating he had told United States officials he would not want penny if it could not be used efficiently, but if a mission determined substantial amounts necessary he could not raise additional amounts for military at cost of sacrificing economic and educational developments. Feared UK had more influence with State Department than it should. When I expressed doubt of UK influence on military aid question replied "forgive me if I disagree". Now actually felt mistake for him to have talked with President for though treated wonderfully by everybody Washington when there his treatment since return been shameful and humiliating. "What are we trying to do make Turkey an honest broker". Said United States papers turning against GOP because GOP cannot say anything. Knew Turkey opposed to Iraq.

My personal summary Governor General discouraged but eventually expects help disappointed amount but bitter about his treatment. Incidentally Foreign Minister spoke at length today to abovementioned travelling United States reporter Mowrer but not to me today about importance of military grant to GOP before any Turkish-GOP agreement. Foreign Minister's statements plus mood Governor General may spell trouble when decisions broken to GOP. Hope I may tell Prime Minister something his return from Dacca January 30. PRIORITY

592. Situation reported ur 561 [2] of greatest concern here. Feel our position somewhat compromised with both Turks and Paks in view of unfortunate leaks and press speculation. Amount of time involved in working out complicated matters with Turkey has been surprisingly short and should have been acceptable except for the press speculation. Although we feel committed to Turkey that next approach to Paks should be by them, believe it best that you have further frank discussion with Paks without waiting for Turks if you feel this would help. You can use as much as you desire of information in recent cables but should caution that much of information will be relayed by Turks on matters in which they and Pakistan will have primary responsibility, and that we believe it important approach come from Turkey in order that consultative arrangement may clearly originate within area.

Pakistan Ambassador here as well in embarrassing position and plan therefore discuss situation with him along above lines today.

Byroade wishes his personal and sincere regrets relayed to Gholem Mohammed and PM over manner in which situation has developed. He believes time has been utilized profitably to work on matters which are in line with their thinking and have been carried out in manner entirely acceptable but for lack of secrecy that unfortunately developed. Nothing has been finalized during this period of preparation nor can it be without willing agreement on all aspects by Pakistan. Hope situation will now develop very rapidly.

[2] Military assistance for Iraq was approved by the President on Jan. 26 and noted in a memorandum for the Director of the Foreign Operations Administration. The closing sentences of the Jan. 26 memorandum noted that the President found Iraq of direct importance to the defense of the Near East area and its increased ability to defend itself important to the security of the United States. The memorandum was attached to another memorandum, dated Jan. 22, from Stassen to the President, informing him the Departments of State and Defense recommended the action. According to the Stassen memorandum, the Department of Defense proposed, and the Department of State endorsed, an initial program of $10 million for Iraq. The amount was to be funded from the $30 million provided specifically for use in the Near East by Congress under Section 202(b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, as amended. Both of the above memoranda were transmitted to the Department of State with a letter from Stassen to the Secretary of State, dated Jan. 29, notifying him formally of the President's action. (780.5/1-2954)

It is intention Turks immediately prior public announcement of Turk-Pakistani decision consult on co-operative arrangements to sound out Iraqis as to their willingness associate themselves such arrangements (para. 8 Ankara Embtel 5 to Baghdad).[3] Believe US approach Iraq few days later could usefully reinforce Turk representations.

Believe at that time it would be proper for Ambassador state US informed of Turkish approach, supports proposed arrangements as contributing area security and hopes Iraq will feel able cooperate now or later. He might also state that while US assistance not conditioned on such cooperation and no commitments or undertakings will be required of Iraq except those stipulated Mutual Security legislation, USG will naturally take account of country's potential contribution to area defense. Effectiveness such contribution obviously will depend in considerable measure upon progress made in developing co-operative arrangements with other countries which have common interest in problem. (This substantially line proposed Embtel 386.)[4]

FYI Saudi Arabians have recently refused sign form of MDAP agreement similar that circulated RECNE meeting Cairo and negotiations will be allowed rest until they see fit request resumption. Iraq only other Arab state to which it is at present planned offer grant military assistance. No aid planned for Israel.

Form of agreement to be negotiated Iraq still under discussion State and Defense with Department making every endeavor secure simplified form similar draft of which Embassy has copy, and to supply text Embassy before date on which Iraqi Government informed of decision.

Discussion with British re principles for coordinating US and British programs Iraq still continues. However, positions close enough warrant despatch military survey team Iraq even if Memorandum of Understanding has not been formally approved by time other necessary preliminaries to this action have been completed.

Department's present thought that such survey team would proceed Baghdad via London and that it might start immediately after opening of negotiations for MDAP agreement, provided Ambassador of opinion that chances Iraq signature reasonably promising.

The Secretary of Defense (Wilson) to the Under Secretary of State (Smith)

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 29, 1954.

DEAR MR. SMITH: Receipt of your letter of November 12, 1953,[1] regarding the status of FY 1955 budget requests for certain Middle East countries is acknowledged, and your apprehension regarding the status of grant military aid programs to these countries is understood and appreciated. The Department of Defense agrees that the requirements of these Middle East countries for military equipment must be met on a timely basis, following the establishment of their eligibility for such aid and, of course, consistent with the rate and volume at which those countries can receive, maintain and effectively utilize the equipment to be provided.

From an overall standpoint, the justification of new obligational authority for MDAP in FY 1955 presents an exceedingly difficult problem, due to the fact that approximately $11.0 billion of matériel provided by FY 1954 and prior year MDAP funds is undelivered; and that approximately $10.4 billion of FY 1954 and prior year funds are unexpended. In light of the disappointing progress in MDAP deliveries and expenditures against prior year appropriations, it appears certain that the FY 1955 MDAP requirements will rightfully be subjected to the closest scrutiny by the Congress, and only those funds which are irrefutably required to carry forward the highest priority and absolutely essential MDAP activities during FY 1955 will be authorized and appropriated.

Since the receipt of your letter of November 12, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have made specific recommendations with regards to the Middle East which were provided the Secretary of State by letter dated January 4, 1954,[2] signed by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

The views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff represent the desirable military point of view. However, for reasons as previously outlined by the Department of State, the Department of Defense recognizes that in addition to the $30 million presently available, a sum of approximately $50 million will be required to implement effectively the political aspects of the first phase military aid to the Middle East. This latter sum ($50 million) has been reserved by the Director, Foreign Operations Administration to be used as a contingency against possible Middle East military requirements, should such considerations be deemed paramount to the interests of the United States. At this time, no bilateral military aid agreements have been concluded with any of the Middle East countries other than Greece, Turkey, Ethiopia and Iran. Considerable time will inevitably elapse between the time bilateral agreements have been concluded and the time when a significant flow of shipments can be achieved. This time lapse is due to the fact that the detailed, specific requirements for material and training in each country must be determined by military survey teams; the resultant lists of equipment must then be priced and the availability and source of supply determined by the military departments; the matériel and training programs must then be submitted to the Director, Foreign Operations Administration, for approval and subsequent allocation of funds to the military departments; after which supply directives can be issued and shipments effected. Overall, these actions are estimated to require from four to six months from the time the bilateral agreements are concluded. Thus it appears that the available FY 1954 funds appropriated or earmarked for application against Middle East programs will assure an acceptable rate of delivery during FY 1955. In the event unforeseen and unanticipated requirements for additional equipment develop consideration could be given to intra-title or inter-title transfer.

[2] Not printed; it summarized the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff concerning allocation of funds to various countries in the Middle East. (780.5/1-454)

Additionally, it is considered that extreme difficulty would be encountered in attempting to adequately and effectively present to the Congress at this time, a justification for additional funds for these Middle East countries in FY 1955, due to the almost complete lack of specific matériel and training requirements; and the fact that no authoritative evaluation can be made at this time regarding the rate and volume at which these countries will be able to receive and effectively utilize the matériel to be provided.

In summary, the Department of Defense is in agreement concerning a requirement for grant military aid, during FY 1955, to the Middle East countries under discussion, but feels that an adequate and acceptable rate of deliveries to these Middle East countries can be achieved without the necessity of requesting additional obligational authority for FY 1955.

Sincerely yours,

C.E. WILSON

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of the Greek, Turkish, and Iranian Affairs (Baxter)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 29, 1954.

Subject: Turkish–Pakistani Developments.

Participants: His Excellency Cevat Açikalin, Secretary General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs
His Excellency Fatin Rustu Zorlu, Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council
His Excellency Feridun C. Erkin, Turkish Ambassador
Mr. Orhan Eralp, Director General, Second Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs
Mr. Henry A. Byroade, Assistant Secretary, NEA
Mr. Alex B. Daspit, NEA
Mr. William O. Baxter, Deputy Director, GTI

When Secretary General Açikalin and his party paid a courtesy call in the Department this afternoon, Mr. Byroade took the opportunity to bring them up to date on developments with regard to the proposed Turkish–Pakistani conversations which had taken place since they left Ankara ten days ago. All members of the group read with great care the text of the Turkish Aide-Mémoire drafted and delivered to our Embassy in Ankara subsequent to their departure, as well as the Department's reply commenting on certain points raised in the Turkish note.

Ambassador Açikalin expressed great satisfaction at the measure of agreement between the Turkish and American points of view. He stated his opinion that Indian reaction, though it would of course be sharp and articulate, could be counteracted so that it would not eventually play a decisive part in area relationships. He also voiced the hope that the United States might find it possible to extend some aid to Afghanistan, but did not press this point vehemently after Mr. Byroade explained that it would take a long time to reach any decision on extending aid to Afghanistan and that, even if the decision were affirmative, he could not envisage assistance in an amount that would be considered sufficient by Afghanistan.

Ambassador Açikalin and his colleagues, as they took leave, reiterated their appreciation to Mr. Byroade for the information he had given them and said that they were "overjoyed" at the success of President Bayar's three-day visit in Washington, particularly the enthusiastic reception given him at this morning's Joint Session of Congress.[1]

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) to the Acting Secretary of State[1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, February 3, 1954.

Subject: Present Status Turkish-Pakistan Security Pact and Military Aid to Pakistan

The Turkish Government and ourselves are in full agreement in their taking the lead in working out with Pakistan an arrangement involving consultation on political, economic and security questions. The following steps are anticipated.

1. We expect the Turks to approach Pakistan within the next couple of days. We will support the Turkish approach and at that time secretly give a commitment to Pakistan to provide military assistance within the framework of the Turkish-Pakistan pact. Other countries with special interest will be given advance information and the Turks will make an explanatory statement in NATO. The Turks and Pakistanis will issue a joint communiqué, it is hoped by early next week, stating that they will consult on matters of mutual interest in the political, economic and security fields.[2]

Virtually the same memorandum was transmitted to the President on Jan. 27 to brief him for a visit with the President of Turkey. Instead of the last paragraph in the memorandum printed here, the memorandum to the President ended with the following: "No doubt the President of Turkey will mention this subject and in addition to your expression of appreciation over the friendly and helpful attitude of his government you might wish to urge earliest possible action by Turkey in the light of the very regrettable publicity. We expect to have a fairly accurate estimate of the chronology of steps very shortly. At that time draft statements of your public reply to Pakistan's request and of your personal message to Nehru will be sent to you for approval." (780.5/1-2754)

[2] Telegram Dulte 22 from Berlin, Jan. 30, from Secretary Dulles at the Four-Power Conference reported Eden had just received a message from Churchill suggesting it might be better if no public announcement of the Turkey-Pakistan accord were made while the Big Four were meeting, in order to avoid giving the Soviets a pretext for bringing it up at the Berlin meeting and propagandizing about the

2. Shortly thereafter, Pakistan would make a public request for military assistance, to which we would reply favorably. A day or two prior to our reply, the Indians would be informed and a special message from you handed to Nehru.

Immediately thereafter, the necessary mutual defense agreement would be negotiated and a military mission despatched to survey needs and arrive at program recommendations.

U.S. officials informed of the impending development of a Turkish-Pakistan pact should be warned of the danger of making public comments in such a way as to suggest the United States Government has played a prominent role in promoting it. . . . An indiscreet comment at this time, just before the anticipated announcement of Turkish-Pakistan plans, might have particularly unfortunate results.

The Ambassador in Turkey (Warren) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET ANKARA, February 5, 1954—3 p. m.

808. For Acting Secretary and Byroade.[1] Please pass also Wilson, Defense and Stassen, FOA.

Now that the negotiations between the Turks and the Pakistanis are well on their way to a successful conclusion, there are two urgent Turkish problems that require immediate consideration and decision.

1. The short-fall in the Turkish defense budget for this next Turkish fiscal year requires immediate decision. To continue as we have in the past to treat this problem on an annual ad hoc basis is not satisfactory. In order to encourage the Turks so to plan their economy that sufficient revenues are available to make their national defense effort self-supporting within the next four years, it is necessary that the United States review the Turkish as well as the American position and establish a general plan on which both we and the Turks can work in order to establish a Turkish military self-sufficiency at a prospective date. Coupled with this problem is the necessity of establishing a machinery of coordination so that successive NATO Commanders assuming responsibility for the land defense of this area shall not change tactical dispositions, particularly with reference to Turkey, beyond the over-all strategic NATO concept as well as the ability of the Turkish Armed Forces to discharge the tactical responsibility that may be placed upon them. Since we are relying upon the Turks to assume leadership in the area not only with respect to the development of the Balkan Tripartite Pact but also in the development of a collaboration of defense that reaches as far east as Pakistan, it is urgently desirable that the Turks should have a maximum degree of confidence in the fact of our planning and the phasing of its execution.[2]

2. The current negotiations with the Turks on facilities and status of forces for our troops have progressed rapidly in the last six weeks and have now reached the point where only two or three subjects of importance are not yet agreed upon. One of these is the question of criminal jurisdiction. We cannot hope for benefits much beyond those obtained by the Turkish adoption of the NATO statute with respect to criminal jurisdiction. The adoption of this statute, whose submission to the Grand National Assembly is awaiting the conclusion of our negotiations, will in itself require some modification of the Turkish constitution with respect to the exercise of judicial processes. To ask the Turks to make an amendment to the constitution on their judicial processes in my opinion can only be justified if we consider it a matter of primary importance.

These considerations lead me to recommend most urgently that the Turkish country team be instructed to return to Washington not later than the last week in February in order to consult with all interested agencies in State, Defense, and FOA in order to arrive at the necessary decisions and then to take into confidence the three appropriate committees of each House of Congress, that is, Foreign Relations, Defense, and Appropriations. If these consultations can take place the last week in February it should be borne in mind that the President of Turkey and his party will have completed their official tour in the United States but will be remaining in New York that week privately and that several of them may be available if desirable for comment on the subject matter of our consultations.

Those two telegrams and additional information are in Department of State file 780.5.

Precise form of agreement still under discussion but two countries in accord as to basic principles. Agreement will be flexibly drawn and open to accession other countries. It will, inter alia, provide for consultation on international matters of mutual interest, cooperation in cultural, economic and technical fields, consultation and cooperation in field of defense, including exchange of technical information, production of arms and ammunition, and studies of ways and extent of cooperation in event of unprovoked aggression.

Within two or three day period prior issuance of communiqué, diplomatic preparations will be undertaken by Turks in Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and India. (Information not yet available as to Pakistan intentions this matter.) There is some basis for believing Iraqi leaders may be interested accession arrangement, and Turks plan make it clear that way open for such accession. In Afghanistan, Turks will endeavor provide assurance that agreement with Paks will not affect long-established friendship of Turks for Afghanistan and will not involve Turkey in Afghan-Pak dispute. In Iran and India, Turks merely plan provide advance information as to nature of proposed arrangement. Although Iranians will no doubt be given to understand that way open to them accede, no overtures will be made. Advance notice will also be supplied NAC.

Turk-Pak arrangement has developed from initiative of two countries and Department believes it important that indigenous character of venture should be emphasized. Although U.S. interest has been shown from start and we have given encouragement, Department convinced U.S. should remain as far in background as possible. U.S. representatives should follow this line in their official contacts. No objection to statement U.S. informed in advance developments underway and had encouraged them, but knowledge of details should not be revealed in advance their public announcement.

Department's public comment on Turk-Pak communiqué will emphasize local initiative. In order avoid impression official U.S. collaboration, comment will probably be made in regular press conference by Departmental spokesman. Advance copy will be furnished through USIA missions and should be used as guidance for any local comment required.

Office now states cooperation agreement will not be concluded before one month. Turkish Ambassador being instructed express surprise, recall Zafrullah's initial favorable reaction to Turkey draft text memorandum re issuance joint communiqué (Embtel 848),[3] state Turkish have therefore, thought full agreement existed in principle and only minor details form and language to be decided, and inquired reasons for indicated delay.

Indications at least casual attitude on part GOP re proposed agreement and misleading interpretation given it after issuance communiqué (Embtel 878, February 22)[4] suggest desirability we emphasize to GOP importance we attach prompt and effective implementation cooperation agreement with Turkey, which considered basis extension US military aid. [1] Drafted by Daspit and Allen and cleared by NE. Repeated to Amman, Baghdad, Cairo, Damascus, Jidda, Ankara, and Karachi.

[2] Not printed; it reported a conversation between Ambassador Hare and President Chamoun. Chamoun believed the Government of Iraq would succeed in joining the Turkish-Pakistan alignment, and its action would impel other Arab countries, including Lebanon, to review their positions. The Ambassador requested Department of State guidance for use in case Lebanon again raised the subject of following Iraq. (780.5/3-1754)

1. FYI, Department endeavoring keep United States far in background of developing Turk-Pakistan arrangements. In addition to obvious tactical advantage this course, consider it would be unwise in present state uncertainty re availability fund for aid programs to take initiative which would imply commitment to provide support to countries joining organization. In Iraq, where strategic stakes are high and decision extend aid already taken, we departed from this line to extent of indicating warm interest in possible Iraqi adherence to pact and implying that amount aid would probably depend on effectiveness Iraqi participation in area defense plans which promised contribute to security of region. No plans take similar initiative in other Arab countries at present, but we would be pleased see countries move toward alignment on their own initiative. Where we can appropriately give impetus to such development, this should be done, but in unobtrusive fashion and with regard for above consideration. End FYI.

2. We prefer you not raise question this time. If Chamoun initiates you should take following line:

Turk-Pakistan arrangements developed on initiative these Middle East countries. We believe this factor of great importance, since indigenous character arrangements should make it easier for other Middle East countries associate themselves. We hope that other states of area will accept implied invitation of Turks and Pakistanis who stated in their original announcement that arrangements would be open other states. We do not know views of Turks and Pakistanis concerning desirable timing of these developments. For ourselves, we convinced that more important than sudden accession of additional states is making sure that arrangements remain based on solid foundation on which they started. If Government Lebanon interested in eventual adherence these arrangements, they might discuss informally with Turks, Pakistanis and Iraqis as situation develops, in order obtain full information on which to base judgment whether participation would serve Lebanese interests.

1108. Re Embtel 1104. [2] Zorin called in Turkish Chargé here March 18 and handed him note protesting Turko-Pakistani agreement. Text published today's Soviet press says in part:

"Turko-Pakistani pact is calculated to involve other countries in military bloc, in view of this it is not without foundation considered nucleus for creation Middle Eastern military bloc.

"Inasmuch as no attack, as is well known, threatens either Turkey or Pakistan, this pact cannot be considered defensive. On contrary, as is evident from statements of officials of Turkey and Pakistan, its preparation is closely connected with military plans of Atlantic bloc and affects security of number of countries, especially in region Near and Middle East and also Southeast Asia.

"Soviet Government in its notes to Government of Turkey of November 24, 1951 and January 28, 1952 noted that attempts to create blocs in region Near and Middle East have aim of turning countries of Near and Middle East into place d'armes for armed forces of aggressive Atlantic bloc . . .

"Goes without saying that action of this kind of Turkish government cannot but aggravate situation in Near and Middle East and also Southeast Asia and has direct relation to security of Soviet Union . . .

"Such policy cannot but harm Soviet-Turkish relations. Acting in this fashion Turkish Government takes on itself responsibility for consequences of such situation."

590. Nuri described the Pakistan Army as admirable, the military training excellent, and an ammunition factory that he saw first class. He said the King, the "Regent" and he were all delighted with the visit. [2]

When I asked him if what he had learned about the Pakistan-Turkish pact had reassured him, he said "The Regent and I are 100 percent for it, and of course, the King". Then when I said that under such circumstances Iraq would likely be planning to join the pact, he looked shrewdly at me and said, "you planned that from the beginning for how else could Pakistan assist Turkey except through Iraq?"

[1] Repeated to Ankara, Karachi, Jidda, Tel Aviv, Amman, Beirut, Cairo, Damascus, Jerusalem, and Tripoli.

[2] Members of the Iraqi Government had visited Pakistan.

He continued, "of course we will join but first we have to meet the problem of neutralizing Middle Eastern public opinion on the Palestine issue". He argued that, since Israel feels confidence in its own strength, the tripartite declarations should be a sufficient guarantee to Israel against an Arab aggression. However, since the Arabs States really do not feel so confident of their strength, they need something more. Thus, for example, if they felt that Pakistan was with them against any aggressor, they could feel secure and such a feeling was a prime necessity for discussing peace with Israel.

Nuri said that Middle Eastern peace and the Turk-Pakistan pact are complementary one to the other and in getting forward with one we are really getting ahead with both. With this in mind he suggested to the Pakistanis that for Iraq to adhere, two modifications should be made in the pact. First, in the preamble, Article 51 of the Charter should be put forward more prominently. He commented that the Arabs constantly complain of the United Nations but they really liked it. Secondly, Article 4, paragraph C of the amended pact should say that an unprovoked attack on Iraq or its neighbors would bring the military aspect of the pact into play. This would mean a greater security for Turkey as under this wording, if Turkey were attacked by the USSR, Iraq could immediately move. It would give the necessary security to Iraq, and at the same time remove the concern of other Arab States over Iraq adherence for they would read into it that an unprovoked Israel attack against Syria would bring Pakistan to the aid of the Arabs.

The Pakistanis said that they were willing to make these changes but the suggestion to make them should come from the United States to Turkey and Pakistan.

Nuri concluded that he was making to me his first report of these conversations and he hoped that if the US were interested in seeing Iraq join the pact, and peace to come to the Middle East, we would give prompt consideration to the suggestion.

The Ambassador in Pakistan (Hildreth) to the Department of State

TOP SECRET KARACHI, April 9, 1954—1 p. m.

820. Principal point in military aid disturbing GOP and quite unclear to Embassy is continuing nature program.

Embassy has assumed from policy decisions inherent in "northern tier" defense concept, Turk-Pakistan agreement, et cetera that continuing defense build up of Pakistan was integral part this policy.

Embassy consequently astonished find survey team [1] thinking of "one shot operation" also to discover in their [garble] that "fiscal year 55 MDAP does not contain funds for ME area other than Greece, Turkey and Iran. There is no assurance that future MDAP will contain funds for Pakistan". Embassy cannot reconcile above with [garble] statement before House Foreign Affairs Committee April 5 that "1955 mutual security program will include continuing authorization for military supplies to Pakistan".

Team was able satisfactorily explain to Pakistanis restrictive nature their mission which well understood and survey accomplished in best atmosphere and with fullest possible Pakistan cooperation. Nevertheless all high GOP officials feel keenest disappointment and puzzlement over failure receive indications long range character program. Both Governor General and Prime Minister have spoken to me last few days and Governor General pleaded with me go to Washington to report.

Pakistan mood is not helped by voluminous publicity on Indian $85 million program and impression US rushing to placate Nehru. Embassy understands $2 million civil aviation program for India just signed. (Seeming capitulation on attrition US observers will not help matters and Prime Minister and Governor General both feel World Bank proposal on canal waters shows desire to appease India because of decision give GOP military aid. [2] Prime Minister has again mentioned gravity Pakistan commitment to West and suggested Iraq others would watch Pakistan see whether commitment was worth risks.

FYI: Formal policy statements on which Pakistan aid program based include NSC 155/1 [3] which lists Pakistan among those states worthy of special consideration as possible recipients of "limited military assistance to promote US security interests, to increase confidence in the US and to help in developing indigenous forces which can improve political stability, internal security, and the maintenance of pro-Western regimes, and ultimately contribute to area defense." NSC 5409 [4] contains following passages bearing on question: "Encourage Pakistan's participation in any defense association which is judged to serve the interests of the United States . . . Seek to insure that in the event of general war Pakistan will make available manpower resources and strategic facilities for mutual defense efforts with the West. Give special consideration to Pakistan in providing military assistance, including grant . . ." Secretary's mention of "continuing authorization" was meant to convey to Congress concept that funds appropriated for FY 1954 have already been reserved for initial MDA program for Pakistan. Sum reserved for Pakistan will, in judgment Defense and FOA, based on experience in getting new MDA programs under way, provide for all effective requirements through FY 1955. Executive Branch therefore not requesting additional funds be appropriated this purpose for FY 1955, but asking only for reappropriation funds appropriated FY 1954 but thus far unused. More accurate version of passage quoted terms of reference military survey team would be "For MDAP in Near East, South Asia, and Africa, the Administration is requesting new obligational authority in FY 1955 only for programs for Greece, Turkey and Iran. It is also requesting reappropriation of approximately $80 million from previous years funds that have been reserved for programs in other countries of this region, including Pakistan". Statement that no assurance future MDAP will carry funds for Pakistan inserted as normal caveat re uncertainty Congressional action and does not indicate lack of purpose in Executive Branch.

Department regrets that lack of clear definition of long-range policy objectives has resulted in disturbing Pakistanis. In discussion with Assistant Secretary Byroade prior team departure Defense officials agreed that team's terms of reference should not be interpreted in restrictive manner and that team report should recommend long-range as well as immediate one-year program. Department considers that long-range policy objectives can be most effectively considered against background of such report and intends to seek further clarification these objectives when report available. End FYI.

Embassy authorized provide GOP following interim statement US intentions, indicating further clarification may be forthcoming later.

1. In providing military assistance to Pakistan within general context of Turk–Pak arrangements, we look forward to long-range developments which should materially improve security of general area of Middle East and South Asia.

2. In effort get developments promptly under way, survey team instructed recommend initial one-year program of military assistance Pakistan. Because of unavoidable administrative delays in establishing MAAG, completing programming, placing orders, effecting shipments, etc., principal accomplishments we expect during initial period will be to lay foundation on which build toward objective stated [by the U.S. Military Survey Team in Phase] "1".

3. We recognize achievement long-range objective will probably require program of several years, and Executive Branch USG planning accordingly. Planning toward these objectives will be based on studies and recommendations of MAAG, Pakistan, and other US agencies concerned MSP, which will consult with appropriate Pakistani authorities. GOP must realize, of course, that effectuation any such plans must depend on willingness Congress to make available necessary funds.

4. We also recognize that to effectuate possible long-range program may create problems for GOP involving balance in budgetary outlays and affecting progress in economic development. USG will be prepared take these problems into account, and US representatives Pakistan who have over-all responsibilities under Mutual Security program will be authorized discuss subject with GOP authorities at appropriate time.[5]

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan) to the Ambassador in Pakistan (Hildreth) [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, April 22, 1954.
OFFICIAL–INFORMAL

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: In our message No. 883, April 16 [2] we provided you just about all the data on the scope and intention of the Pakistan arms program it is possible to clear at this time on an official basis. I hope you will find it useful in clearing up some of the confusion which was generated by the statements as well, apparently, as by the unspoken attitude of the members of General Meyers' survey team. In addition to the material included in that message I feel we owe you a personal explanation of some of the off-the-record factors which contributed to this confusing situation. I am accordingly writing you this letter for your confidential information in the hope that it will provide some measure of reassurance that confused as the situation in Washington may be, it has not fallen into the state of utter contradiction which recent official communications might seem to indicate.

The first element to take into account in attempting to understand the Pakistan aid problem is the fact that the nature and importance of United States strategic interests in the general area of the Middle East and South Asia has been defined in only vague and general terms. As a consequence, the amount of the investment justified to protect these interests is a matter which is certain to produce considerable debate but has as yet led to no agreed conclusion. It can be said that over the past several years there has been a sort of glacial movement toward the acceptance of increased United States responsibility in the area. The movement has been so gradual, however, as to be almost imperceptible and it has taken place largely without benefit of conscious guidance and impulse. By and large the State Department has been convinced that the logic of events compelled this development and that this should be recognized as a basis of policy. The Pentagon, on the other hand, feeling that available United States forces and resources were inadequate for this additional undertaking on top of our many other commitments around the world have consistently fought shy of this conclusion. A complete reconciliation of these inconsistencies has not yet been achieved.

[1] This letter was drafted by Daspit and cleared by SOA.
[2] Document 205.

This was the somewhat confused backdrop against which the decision to supply aid to Pakistan was taken. The inconsistencies were not first resolved, and are not even now, but I believe by that act we moved closer to such a resolution. As you know, this was in every sense a "high-level" decision in which the President, Secretaries of State and Defense, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff concurred. The whole problem had been raised to that level almost from the beginning by virtue of the importance of the Indian aspect of the matter, as well as by the successful promotional activities of General Ayub and Ghulam Mohammed. On the other hand, the question was never referred to the NSC with all of the prolonged staff work and the extensive circulation of drafts this would have involved.

When the decision was finally reached, I believe there was full recognition on the part of those making it of the need to carry through on a significant basis. We have reports that the President himself is of this mind and we know that Admiral Radford is strongly of this opinion. At the operating level in the Pentagon, however, where the terms of reference for the survey team were drafted—in the Office of Military Assistance and G-3 of the Army—it is doubtful that these views were known. Instead of reflecting the current views of the President, the Secretaries and Admiral Radford, the terms of reference reflected the long-standing uncertainty as to strategic objectives described above, as well as the general philosophy of "economize and cut-back" which has been constantly dinned into all levels of Pentagon personnel.

We saw the terms of reference in draft form and made a number of suggestions for modification, including clear directions to the team to prepare a long-term as well as an initial one-year program. When some of our officers went over to the Pentagon to brief the team the day before General Meyers departed from Washington, they discovered that not only had there been no such amendment in the terms of reference, but that General Meyers had become so infected with the philosophy of caution and doubt the terms of reference seemed to reflect that he was talking an extremely alarming line which he planned to take with the Pakistanis. On the basis of the report our officers brought back, Byroade arranged the next morning a meeting with Admiral Davis, the Director of the Office of Foreign Military Affairs in Defense, and General Stewart, the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, which was attended by a liberal sprinkling of Defense officials and by General Meyers.

In this meeting, it was demonstrated that at Admiral Davis's level there was no lack of intention to carry through, and he clearly and emphatically told General Meyers that the Pakistan program was not to be regarded as a "one-shot" operation. He said the team should report long-range objectives as well as a detailed initial one-year program and stated that if General Meyers felt his terms of reference inhibited the submission of such a report, he, Admiral Davis, would change the terms of reference forthwith. General Meyers thereupon professed complete satisfaction with these statements and volunteered that since there was general agreement on Admiral Davis's interpretation of his mission he would proceed on that basis. He said further, that in view of the general agreement indicated, he did not feel that any alteration in the terms of reference was necessary. We returned from this meeting feeling that General Meyers understood the position and that the survey would proceed on the right basis and with the proper intent.

Accordingly we were not only disturbed but considerably perplexed when the returns from Karachi began to come in. I do not profess to understand the actions and statement of General Meyers. As described by the Embassy, they were completely at variance with the explicit understanding reached at our meeting.[3]

With your telegram No. 820[4] as a point of departure we moved as quickly as we could to clear the statement which reached you in our telegram No. 883. Although this message represents the limit of what we can say at present, we recognize that it will be desirable to have a more nearly definitive statement of long range objectives. As we stated in our telegram we think a good time to seek this will be shortly after the survey team report has been submitted. It may still be impossible to secure a statement as clear cut as we would like, but the glacier is moving. I have no doubts personally that we will be able to follow through with the Pakistan program in a manner which will convince even the doubters that the United States supports its friends. The logic of the situation is too clear and the supporters of the Pakistan program too strong to permit any other development. It may, and probably will, take a good while to get the program effectively moving: this has been the history of MDAP everywhere. But don't let the inevitable slow start or possible confusing statement from Washington disconcert you or discourage the Pakistanis. There is solid basis for believing that we are at the beginning of important developments in connection with this program, and we are convinced that all of us concerned with it should proceed on that assumption.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. JERNEGAN

Paper Prepared in the Office of Intelligence Research, Department of State [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, May 3, 1954.

OIR CONTRIBUTION TO NIE 30-54: MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE

CONCLUSIONS

1. Prospects for the development of effective defense of the Middle East against a major aggressor are only slightly more favorable now than in 1951 and 1952, the dates of the unsuccessful MEC and MEDO proposals.

2. The Turk-Pakistani agreement providing for defense consultation as an initial step toward regional defense, attempts to overcome one obstacle to previous attempts to set up regional defense—namely, an over-emphasis on Western initiative and direction. In addition, the possibility of substantial MDAP assistance without ostensible "strings" offers a new feature in the situation since all of the states in the area desire to improve or expand their military establishments. Despite these potentially favorable factors, however, there 0are serious obstacles to be surmounted before a wider regional defense system can be brought into being.

3. Iran and Afghanistan are unlikely to risk joining any Middle East defense arrangement until it has shown sufficient strength to provide them immediately with a fair degree of protection.

4. The adherence of Iraq to the Turk-Pakistani pact is problematic since it depends on the strength and nature of internal as well as external opposition, with time apparently working to reduce the prospect of adherence. An important variable, however, will be the timing, scope and nature of MDAP assistance.

[1] The source text was the first section of a 40-page paper prepared in OIR. No drafter was listed on the text. The rest of the paper consisted of sections on the background of a Middle East defense organization, the attitudes of other states toward adherence to the Turkish-Pakistan agreement, the prospects for development of a formal regional defense organization, the probable attitudes of other countries toward a formal regional defense organization, and the probable consequences of developments in Middle East defense.

The "conclusions" section was attached to a memorandum by Fritzlan to Hart, dated May 14, not printed (780.5/5-1454), which disagreed with a number of statements in the paper. For a more formal statement of disagreement, see the paper approved by the Chiefs of Mission Conference at Istanbul, May 14, entitled "Conference Statement on Middle East Defense Commenting on OIR Contribution to NIE 30-54, May 3, 1954," Document 212. NIE 30-54, June 22, is printed as Document 215.

5. Egyptian support for the purposes of the Turk-Pakistani agreement will depend on the outcome of Anglo-Egyptian negotiations respecting the Suez base. If these negotiations are successful, Egypt's policy will probably be favorable to the general purposes of the Turk-Pakistani arrangement, particularly if Western military assistance were provided to Egypt.

6. The willingness of other Arab states to adhere to the Turk-Pakistani agreement will depend on the attitudes of both Iraq and Egypt. If either Iraq or Egypt should be favorable and the other unfavorable, the situation with respect to the other Arab countries would be difficult to assess; fears of Israel would increase, Arab balance of power rivalries would be intensified, and united Arab response could hardly be expected.

7. Whatever success may attend efforts to bring about a regional defense grouping on the Turk-Pakistani pattern, prospects for a tighter defense organization, with planning and coordinating functions and perhaps a combined command, are not likely to become more favorable unless there is a reduction of the basic incompatibilities of Western and Middle Eastern political objectives, and in particular a lessening of the tensions between the Western powers and the Middle East states which arise from the Anglo-Egyptian and Anglo-Iranian disputes and the Arab-Israeli conflict. Other rivalries and tensions in the area also present serious, though not necessarily insuperable, obstacles to the successful operation of a regional defense arrangement of this more effective nature. Such an arrangement could probably gain force and effectiveness only as a consequence of an enlarged direct political and military assistance role of the US and continued US/UK cooperation. France would play only a marginal role in these defense arrangements, although it would expect to be consulted. The UK, with its special treaty rights and positions, would be extremely vigilant in protecting its regional interests and would seek to reconcile the purposes of any regional arrangement with these interests.

Editorial Note

The Conference of the United States Chiefs of Mission in the Near East Area (RECNE) was held at Istanbul, Turkey, from May 11 through May 14, 1954. Present at the Conference were Henry Byroade, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs; Burton Y. Berry, Ambassador to Iraq; Cavendish W. Cannon, Ambassador to Greece; Raymond A. Hare, Ambassador to Lebanon; Loy W. Henderson, Ambassador to Iran; Horace A. Hildreth, Ambassador to Pakistan; Lester D. Mallory, Ambassador to Jordan; James S. Moose, Ambassador to Syria; Henry S. Villard, Minister to Libya; George Wadsworth, Ambassador to Saudi Arabia; Angus Ward, Ambassador to Afghanistan; Avra M. Warren, Ambassador to Turkey; Francis H. Russell, Chargé d'Affaires at Tel Aviv; G. Lewis Jones, Counselor of Embassy at Cairo; Evan Wilson, First Secretary of Embassy at London; William Burdett, Office of Near Eastern Affairs, Department of State; and Donald C. Bergus, Acting Executive Secretary of the Conference.

On the opening day of the Conference, each participant gave a brief review of the current situation in the country to which he was accredited. Those reviews are in the "Summary Record of the Conference of U.S. Chiefs of Mission in the NEA Area Held at Istanbul, May 11-14, 1954," which also includes a brief statement by each of the participants on the general reputation of the United States in the country to which he was assigned. The Summary Record, not printed, is in Department of State file 120.4382.

Following the country reviews, the members of the Conference had a lengthy discussion of the problem of regional security in the Near East. The agreed conclusions of the Conference on that topic, drafted by Henderson with the assistance of Berry and Jones, are Annex A to the Summary Record of the Conference, and are printed infra. After another lengthy discussion of the problem of the Arab-Israeli tensions in the area, the agreed conclusions of the Conference on that topic were drafted by Hare, assisted by Russell. That paper is Annex B to the Summary Record of the Conference, Document 824.

CONFERENCE CONCLUSIONS ON REGIONAL SECURITY IN THE MIDDLE EAST

In preparing the suggestions set forth below, the Conference considered it unnecessary to dwell on the basic considerations responsible for its belief that the erection by the countries of the Middle East of a strong regional security structure would be in the interest of the United States. It has assumed that the interested US Governmental agencies are already well informed in this respect. It might be pointed out, nevertheless, that the participants of the Conference are convinced that it is one of the objectives of the Soviet Union to bring the Middle East behind the Iron Curtain and that the Soviet Union is constantly maneuvering with the purpose of facilitating the attainment of this objective; that it is desirable that the people of the Middle East should have confidence that there is a possibility of preventing the Soviet Union from obtaining control of the area; and that the loss of the Middle East to the Soviet Union would represent a major catastrophe to the free world.

1. It is the consensus of the Conference that a regional defense arrangement among the nations forming the so-called "Northern Tier"--that is, Pakistan, Iran, Iraq, and Turkey—would strengthen materially the security and stability of the Middle East, and would therefore be in the interest of the free world and in the national interest of the US.

2. The Conference, therefore, welcomes the arrangements which are being entered into between Turkey and Pakistan as a first step in the formation of the "Northern Tier".

3. The Conference is hopeful that the agreement entered into recently between the US and Iraq, under which the US under certain conditions is to furnish military assistance to Iraq, will tend to encourage Iraq to become a member of the "Northern Tier". The Conference believes that it would be a mistake for the US to bring pressure on Iraq to apply for admission into such regional security arrangements at this time; it is thought that it would be preferable for Iraq to consult with Turkey and Pakistan and then to decide for itself the course it should take.

[1] Loy Henderson, assisted by Burton Berry and G. Lewis Jones, drafted this paper after a discussion of the topic by the participants at the Chiefs of Mission Conference at Istanbul, and it became Annex A to the Summary Record of the Conference. (120.4382/5-1454) For details of the Conference, see the editorial note, supra.

4. It is the understanding of the Conference that, although Iran is convinced that its own security and that of the area would be strengthened if its defense could be coordinated with that of Pakistan, Iraq and Turkey, Iran does not believe it would be useful for it to enter into a regional security arrangement with these countries until it possesses armed forces capable of contributing to the defense of itself and to that of the area. The Conference, therefore, recommends that the US give consideration to assisting Iran within the shortest possible period to reorganize and strengthen its armed forces to such an extent that they would have defense capabilities. This assistance should be in the form of carefully selected matériel, highly concentrated training, advice with regard to organization and placing of Iranian armed forces and with regard to shifting of certain Iranian arsenals and supply bases to areas where they might be best defended from Soviet invading forces. The Conference also recommends that until the Iranian budgetary position is substantially improved, the military supplies and advisers be furnished on a grant basis and the US pay the cost of the additional training necessary to convert the present flaccid Iranian armed forces into cohesive hard-hitting military units.

5. The Conference is of the opinion that with the formation of a "Northern Tier", an already isolated Afghanistan might become more attractive to Soviet aggressors, and also might become more susceptible to Soviet influence. It therefore recommends that the US make special efforts to bring about a closer association between Afghanistan and the members of the "Northern Tier", particularly Pakistan and Iran. It further recommends that efforts be made to exploit the indicated desire of Afghanistan for military assistance in such a manner as to encourage it to stand up to Soviet pressure and that Afghanistan be given to understand that the eventual receipt by it of grant US military aid must be linked with its willingness to collaborate in matters of regional defense with the countries of the "Northern Tier". In this connection study might be given to the possibility of ameliorating the hostility between Pakistan and Afghanistan growing out of the Pushtoonistan dispute by using Pakistan as a channel for extending military and economic assistance to Afghanistan. It is also suggested that consideration be given to the possibility that, in view of the strong ties existing between Turkey and Afghanistan, the former be urged to play a positive role in improving Afghan-Pakistan relations.

6. It is the consensus of the Conference that if the Arab countries lying behind the "Northern Tier"—that is, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Libya, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan—should later individually or collectively ask to participate in this regional security arrangement, it would be in the interest of the US for such request or requests to be considered sympathetically. It was the general belief of those attending the Conference, however, that the US at this stage should not endeavor to encourage or discourage these Arab countries to make such requests. It should not encourage them because in the opinion of the Conference it might be preferable, at least in the initial stages of the organization, for the "Northern Tier" to be limited to the four countries mentioned in paragraph 1. If, without prompting from the US one or more Arab countries should ask to join the "Northern Tier" and be rejected, this might create friction harmful to area security. Requests should be examined, therefore, in the light of all the factors involved at the time.

7. The Conference acknowledges that support of the "Northern Tier" by Syria, Lebanon and Jordan would constitute a defense contribution to strengthen the area. Accordingly, the Conference would favor the extension at an appropriate later date of military aid to these states dependent upon their willingness and ability to participate in the defense of the region.

It is the understanding of the Conference that Lebanon, which has no alternative except that of siding with the West, is considering the advisability of following Iraq's example and making a request in the near future for grant military assistance in anticipation that its action would probably lead to participation in some form of regional defense arrangement. It appears that any contribution of Lebanon would be limited to its extensive airfield and to its ports.

It is considered possible that Syria might at some moment desire to participate in this regional security arrangement if it could obtain grant military aid thereby. It is believed that it would have little to contribute other than lines of access, air bases and ports.

Whether or not Jordan should desire to enter into the security arrangement would depend to a large extent upon the attitude of its ally, Great Britain, which is financing Jordan and supplying its military needs.

The Conference believed that Libya because of its strategic air bases and increasingly close ties with Turkey could make an appropriate contribution to the security arrangements of the area. It was considered probable that Libya would wish to join any defense arrangement including the Arab countries that offered the prospect of economic or military grant aid in return for the use of its base facilities.

8. The Conference recommends that negotiations be continued between Saudi Arabia and the US for the purpose of strengthening present arrangements (Dhahran Air Base Agreement and Mutual Defense Assistance Agreement for the extension of cash reimbursable military aid, both signed June 18, 1951)[2] for the extension by the US to Saudi Arabia of assistance in the organizing and equipping of Saudi Arabian armed forces capable of maintaining internal security. The expenses involved should continue to be borne by Saudi Arabia with the exception of the cost of the training and with the added exception that "training aid" should be furnished without cost by the US. The Conference was of the opinion that Saudi Arabia would not be able to make any contributions to the security of the area beyond maintaining internal stability, including protection of ARAMCO installations and personnel, and furnishing airfields and rear lines of communication.

9. The Conference noted that Egypt is likely to be displeased at the concept of a "Northern Tier". Egypt will resent any Middle East arrangement in which it does not play a leading role. Egypt regards itself as indispensable to the defense of the Arab world. It is the view of the Conference that on appropriate occasions it be made clear to Egypt that the "Northern Tier" concept does not reduce the importance of Egypt, especially from the point of view of bases, communications and manpower. It is in the US interest that nothing in the "Northern Tier" concept should derogate from the US program to strengthen Egypt by military and economic assistance, to establish Egypt firmly on the side of the West, and to associate Egypt in some manner in the defense of the area. Such a program contemplates an early Anglo-Egyptian settlement.

10. It is the consensus of the Conference that if the "Northern Tier" concept is to have success in promoting the security of the Middle East and South Asia it must have the support of the British Government. It is the understanding of the Conference that the British Government has certain reservations regarding this concept and in particular is not enthusiastic about the inclusion of Iran. The Conference expressed the hope that as the result of political and military conversations with the British in the near future British doubts will be resolved, and that continued US and UK cooperation will be assured.

11. The Conference understands that Israel presently has the most capable military force in the Middle East outside of Turkey with a potential five divisions based on some 57,000 regular personnel and 145,000 trained reserves. As a result, Israel is at present able to defend itself against any likely combination of Arab states.

[2] For documentation, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, pp. 1017 ff.

If at an appropriate later date a program of arms aid to the Arab states should be instituted, it is believed that such aid will not materially change this power relationship for a considerable period after its initiation. It is also believed that a program of arms aid to Israel at the present time would result in Arab refusal to cooperate in measures designed to strengthen area defense. A program of military grant aid to Israel is therefore not now recommended. An arms aid program of the nature envisaged in the preceding paragraphs, however, might result in the danger that the arms would at some later time be used by the Arab states against Israel and will certainly give rise to fears by Israel of such a danger. To meet both the danger and the fear the Conference recommends:

(a) that Arab states contiguous to Israel be informed in discussions with them concerning possible arms aid that the Government of the US must be in a position publicly to state that the assurances which it had received from the Arab states not to use such arms for aggressive purposes were applicable to all countries, including Israel;

(b) that the US, the UK and France make public declarations of their intention to take specified economic and military sanctions to prevent the occupation by either Israel or the Arab states of territory of the other;

(c) that indirect and unattributed publicity be given to the fact that the contemplated scope, character and phasing of aid would not be such as to constitute a danger of their use for aggressive purposes.

TOP SECRET

ISTANBUL, May 14, 1954.

CONFERENCE STATEMENT ON MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE COMMENTING ON OIR CONTRIBUTION TO NIE 30–54, MAY 3, 1954 [2]

The Conference of Chiefs of Mission held at Istanbul May 11–14, 1954 considered in considerable detail the problem of defense of the Near and Middle East against a Soviet aggressor and in some respects, the generally prevailing opinion diverged from the conclusions embodied in the OIR contribution to NIE 30-54, May 3, 1954.

---

[1] This paper was prepared by James S. Moose and adopted by the participants at the Chiefs of Mission Conference at Istanbul. It is Annex C to the Summary Record of the Conference. (120.4382/5–1454) For details of the Conference, see Document 210.

[2] Document 209. NIE 30–54, is Document 215.

The Conference held the view that the current plans intended to insure Middle East defense should be considered as having their inception in the programs of aid for Greece and Turkey inaugurated in 1947 and that the abortive MEC and MEDO proposals in 1951 and 1952 were further moves in the same direction. The MEC and MEDO proposals failed in large part because they over-emphasized Western initiative. The view of the Conference was that in the Turk-Pakistani accord this over-emphasis had been alleviated and that expansion of the pact held out promise of organizing worthwhile forces within the area for its defense.

To achieve this end, the Conference believed that adherence of the other states of the "Northern Tier" i.e., Iraq and Iran, was of primary importance, and that adherence of certain other states was desirable in varying degrees. Those states were Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Afghanistan and Libya. It was not believed that Israel should adhere to the pact in the foreseeable future. The view was also held that U.S. and U.K. cooperation would be essential to the success of the organization as would U.S. military assistance.

General consideration of the problem of Regional Security in the Near and Middle East and the conference views thereon are given in another paper, and the following remarks deal primarily with the prospect of securing the participation of states of the area in an expanded Turk-Pakistani pact.

In addition to the desire for greater security, states of the region generally wish to enlarge or to improve their military establishment and so would be attracted in a greater or lesser degree by the prospect of U.S. bilateral grant military assistance.

Iraq signed a military aid agreement with the U.S. on April 21, 1954. The King, the Crown Prince Abdul Ilah, Nuri Pasha, and other Iraqi leaders are known to favor adherence to the Turk-Pakistani pact, and the extent and nature of the U.S. aid actually extended to Iraq will be affected by Iraq's attitude. The Conference was of the opinion that Iraq would adhere to the pact eventually, though some time might be required for the preparation of Iraqi and Arab public opinion for such a move.

Iran has a military aid agreement with the U.S. of several years standing. The Shah and General Zahedi both favor Iranian participation in the Turk-Pakistani pact. The Conference expected them to wait, however, until the Iranian forces were better able to assist in area defense and until an agreement had been reached re Iranian oil. Additional and effective military aid to Iran, in the opinion of the Conference, would be likely to hasten Iranian adherence.

Because of Afghanistan's exposed position, the Conference did not expect Afghanistan, despite any Afghan desire to participate in regional defense, to adhere to the Turk-Pakistani pact until progress could be made toward a settlement of the Pushtunistan issue with Pakistan.

High Lebanese officials have indicated that Lebanon will ask for certain military aid from the U.S. and will be prepared to follow Iraq in adhering to the pact. The Conference therefore believed that Lebanese adherence can be secured by the time it would have any practical value.

An offer of grant military aid was believed to be prerequisite to Syrian participation in the pact. The extent of the aid required, it was believed, might vary according to political developments in the region.

Jordan, in the opinion of the Conference, could be brought into the pact by British influence, if its participation were desirable.

The Conference held the view that Saudi adherence to the Turk-Pakistani pact in the near future was unlikely, but that the U.S. by strengthening its present arrangements with Saudi Arabia, could secure all the support of which that country was capable.

While Egypt would initially dislike the idea of adhering to the Turk–Pakistani pact, a settlement of the Suez Canal issue with the British and U.S. military and economic aid, combined with the participation of other Arab League states might act as inducements to Egypt to eventually follow suit if no other defense arrangement more attractive to Egypt were available.

It was the consensus that Libya could be induced to adhere to the Turk–Pakistani pact, if that were desirable, by a grant of economic and/or military aid.

The Conference did not believe that Israel is now in a position to be integrated into any area defense plan now under consideration.

Members of the Conference were unanimous in the opinion that effective U.S.–U.K. cooperation would be necessary to the establishment of a regional defense organization, and that the U.K. would endeavor to protect its special treaty positions while providing for defense. They were likewise unanimous in the belief that France will be of little assistance in such a project, but that in view of the French position elsewhere, France must be consulted on important matters.

In summary, the Conference believed that expansion of the Turk–Pakistani pact offered a feasible method of setting up a regional defense organization, that progress might be slow, but that none of the obstacles now discernible by their nature preclude achievement of the project.

The Ambassador in Turkey (Warren) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET ANKARA, June 15, 1954—3 p. m.

1334. Prime Minister asked me to meet him last night to discuss progress of events in this country since his return from US a week ago. [2] There were present also Deputy Prime Minister Zorlu, the Foreign Minister and the acting Secretary General of the Foreign Office Dr. Birgi. Foreign affairs portion of discussions developed along following lines:

Conversations with Pakistanis. Prime Minister expressed pleasure with conversations he held with Prime Minister of Pakistan during his short visit to Turkey last week. He said there was a complete meeting of minds on objectives of Turkish-Pakistan agreement and tactics to be employed to press Iraqis and Iranians into the agreement. With respect to the Iraqis, Prime Minister of Pakistan agreed with him that course of Iraqi Government is ambiguous, uncertain and irresponsible. They say one thing to Americans, another thing to Pakistanis, a third to Turks and fourth to Arab League. They agreed that pressure must be applied to Iraq but they should await the formation of the new government of Iraq and then tell them in no uncertain terms that Iraq must fish or cut bait. It was agreed Turks would take initiative and Prime Minister has already seen Iraqi Ambassador on this matter.

With respect to implementation of Turkish-Pakistan agreement, the two Prime Ministers arranged for two study groups to be designated immediately and have exchanges of information and planning between the two general staffs. Menderes was very pleased about Mohammed Ali's expressed willingness to make Pakistan military units available for an expeditionary force should events require more positive support of the Iraqis and Iranians after these two countries have joined the agreement and have expressed their willingness to have outside assistance in event of aggression.

[1] Repeated to Karachi, Baghdad, Tehran, Jidda, Cairo, Damascus, Beirut, Tel Aviv, and Amman; transmitted in two sections.

[2] Documentation is scheduled for publication in volume VIII.

Prime Minister explained to Pakistanis Turkey's attitude toward Israel and the Arab League as well as Turkey's relationship to Egypt. With respect to Israel the fact that Turkey is discouraging Israelis from joining pact should be considered as positive action by all of Arab states. At same time Turkey is not disposed to take any anti-Israel action. Pakistan Prime Minister said he understood Turkish position and is prepared to go along with it.

In case of Iran, Prime Ministers of Turkey and Pakistan agreed they should present a common front and encourage attitudes in Iran favorable to adherence to agreement. They should each give positive evidence of their interest and sympathy in solution of Iranian oil problem as a major economic necessity before Iranians would be in position to develop their armed forces. Pakistanis agreed to keep their mission in Iran currently informed. It was also agreed that Turkish Ambassador and his Pakistan colleague in Tehran should consult informally and continuously to give all possible support to Shah and Zahedi government. As proof of Turks desire to move promptly and affirmatively with Iranians, Foreign Minister and later Prime Minister have had conversations with Iranian Ambassador in Ankara.

Menderes believes visit of Pakistan Prime Minister has been most useful in bringing about a meeting of minds and a formulation of their plans both militarily and politically to present a common front in applying pressure to Iraq and Iran to join their agreement.

Iran: Prime Minister said a recent denunciation of the Saadabad pact by Secretary General of Iranian Foreign Office as being no longer effective provided a suitable occasion to initiate conversations with Iranian Ambassador. Turkish Foreign Minister called in Iranian Minister and Turkish Ambassador in Tehran also called on Foreign Minister. Turkish Prime Minister saw Iranian Ambassador in Ankara who stated that Secretary General of Iranian Foreign Office had acted without authority or knowledge of Iranian Government and that Saadabad pact is still in effect. [3] Prime Minister then went on to express in name his government, his interest in Iran and his desire to be of all possible assistance in promoting well being of Iranian Government and people. He asked Ambassador to express to Shah and Prime Minister Zahedi this expression of the Turkish attitude and desire to be helpful. Iranian Ambassador said that his country's greatest need at the moment was a solution of the oil problem in order to provide revenues for restoration of the economy and organization of the country's defense.

[3] For text of the Treaty of Nonaggression (Saadabad Pact), concluded between Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq and Turkey, July 8, 1937, see League of Nations Treaty Series, vol. 190 (1938), p. 21.

He said Iran would be most appreciative if Turks could express both to British and Americans their interest in an early solution of the oil problem. Prime Minister then inquired if there were any specific suggestions Ambassador could make along these lines and if not could he ascertain from his government any specific aspects of oil problem still unsolved on which Turks could express interest either to US or Great Britain. Iranian Ambassador said his conversation with Prime Minister was too voluminous for cable but he would write to his Prime Minister by next courier and would not fail to keep Turks informed of progress of petroleum negotiations.

Prime Minister then informed Iranian Ambassador that during visit last week of Pakistan Prime Minister problem of Iran and its situation so exposed to the threats of aggression had engaged their common interest. They were both in agreement that they should seek every opportunity to follow and support Shah and Zahedi Government and to demonstrate to government and people and Iran their interest in their situation and their willingness to do everything possible to promote their well-being.

Prime Minister added that such relatively minor difficulties as border questions between Iran and Pakistan on one side and Iran and Turkey on other are in themselves insignificant and could well be solved informally and directly. Iranian Ambassador expressed his admiration and appreciation of the attitude of Turkish Government and will seek instructions directed towards a closer approachment between the two countries.

Iraq: Prime Minister has not yet asked Iraqi Ambassador to come to see him. However, Iraqi has sought him out to present one aspect of his country's attitude towards Turk-Pakistan agreement and found occasion Turkish reception given by Turkish Government last Thursday to visiting Pakistan delegation to have a conversation. At that time he spoke of difficulties his country faces in terms of its relations with Arab League, its attitude towards Israel, and internal situation of the country which seems ill-conditioned to make a positive decision to identify Iraq with Turkey and Pakistan. Prime Minister replied that he is receiving constantly reports from his Embassy in Baghdad and that he will ask the Iraqi Ambassador to come and see him in next few days to discuss common danger faced by all countries in area and best measures to be taken to meet it. Although he had planned to see the Iraqi immediately after the elections on June 9, he now considers it desirable to postpone conversations with him until new government is seated. Then he intends to tell Iraqis that they face necessity of decision and that there is no longer a place for a negative attitude. Conversation with Iraqis closed last Thursday by Iraqi Ambassador saying they wished to regard Turks as their big brother. Prime Minister replied that his government has no desire to be big brother to anybody, that Turks are alert to dangers that face the whole world and particularly to threat of aggression facing the countries of this area. They feel Iraqi people must be alerted to facts of life and they hope that within the very early future Iraqis will identify themselves with Turks and Paks not as big and little brothers but as close and cooperative members of the new axis. He will be seeing Iraqi within the next two weeks.

Egypt: During his conversations with Pakistan Prime Minister, Menderes discussed position of Egypt and Egyptian attitude towards Pakistan and Turkey. He said Egyptians feel themselves challenged as leaders of Arab League and their attitude towards the Paks is almost as critical as it is towards Turks. Egyptian press has engaged in last few days in an attack on Prime Minister Menderes and in denouncing Turk-Pak agreement as an instrument calculated to destroy the Arab League. Since Egyptian press is now controlled and may be understood to reflect views of Egyptian Government, Prime Minister had Egyptian Chargé Affaires called to Foreign Office and told these attacks must cease. If they do not, Egyptian was warned that Turks will consider reprisal action and this would not be in the interest of maintaining good relations between the two countries that are so necessary in this area.

PROSPECTS FOR CREATION OF A MIDDLE EAST DEFENSE GROUPING AND PROBABLE CONSEQUENCES OF SUCH A DEVELOPMENT [3]

THE PROBLEM

To examine, with special reference to the "northern tier" [4] approach, the problems likely to be encountered in the development of a Middle East defense grouping, and to estimate: (a) the prospects for adherence of other states to a loose grouping based on the Turk-Pakistani agreement; (b) the probable political and military consequences of such a development; and (c) the probable reactions of other countries.

SCOPE

This estimate focuses primarily on the prospects for creation of a loose Middle East defense grouping through a "northern tier" approach. This would involve initially adherence of Iraq and Iran to the US-sponsored Turk-Pakistani agreement. At a later date, it might involve the adherence of other Middle Eastern states, and possible eventual expansion of such a grouping into a formal regional defense organization. We recognize, however, that various factors such as US or UK policy, the attitudes of various Middle East states, or the Soviet reaction might dictate alternative approaches to meet individual country problems as they arise. For example, some Middle East states might be unwilling to adhere to the Turk–Pakistani agreement but might be willing, in return for US aid, to cooperate in regional defense through a grouping of their own or some form of bilateral relationship with the US and/or UK. We briefly assess some of these alternatives.

The military portions of this estimate concern themselves primarily with the defense problems within the area extending from the Suez Canal and the Southeast Turkish border to the western border of Pakistan. We do not consider the problems of defense of Turkey against attack from the north, which is a NATO responsibility, nor the defense of the lines of communication into the area.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The Turk-Pakistani agreement provides a new basis for development of a Western-oriented defense grouping in the Middle East avoiding some of the problems which defeated the two previous efforts in this direction. Although formidable obstacles still remain to be overcome, a regional grouping based on the Turk–Pakistani agreement would be less subject to the stigma of being under direct Western control than were the Middle East Command and Middle East Defense Organization. The desire for US military and economic aid is probably the most powerful inducement to enter into such an arrangement, and the willingness of individual states to join will depend largely on the nature, scale, and terms of the US aid offered them.

2. An important obstacle to the adherence of any Arab state to the Turk–Pakistani agreement is Egypt's opposition prior to a Suez settlement. If a satisfactory Suez agreement can be reached, Egypt will in fact be involved in regional defense and much of its opposition to Western-supported regional defense arrangements will be undercut. Under these circumstances we believe that Iraq would adhere to the Turk–Pakistani agreement and the way would be paved for the adherence of other Arab states. Egypt, conscious that it might be unable to play a key role in a scheme based on the Turk-Pakistani agreement, would probably prefer some other form of peacetime defense association with the West. However, it might be willing to adhere to the agreement if necessary to secure substantial US aid.

3. Even if there is no Suez settlement, Iraq probably would be willing to adhere to the Turk-Pakistani agreement in the face of opposition from Egypt alone. Such a move would raise a critical issue among the Arab states, but some might still follow the Iraqi lead. Iraq would probably not adhere if it thereby incurred a grave risk of general opposition from the other Arab states and increased internal opposition.

4. Iran's adherence to the Turk-Pakistani agreement is unlikely at any early date. However, it might eventually join an established regional defense grouping if: (a) the oil dispute had been resolved; (b) Iran's leadership had confirmed its ability to hold extremist anti-Western elements in check; and (c) Iran's military strength had been substantially increased with US aid.

5. The immediate effects of a loose regional defense grouping based on the Turk-Pakistani agreement and backed by US military aid programs would be primarily political and psychological rather then military. Creation of such a grouping would: (a) tend to create a favorable climate for development of greater awareness of the Soviet threat and closer regional defense cooperation; (b) possibly encourage participating states to cooperate more closely on other matters, both with the Western allies and among themselves; and (c) strengthen the position of Western-oriented elements in participating countries. However, such developments would not materially affect the internal weaknesses which have thus far undermined Middle East strength and stability, and would by no means eliminate the tensions and fears which have thus far alienated much of the area from the West.

6. Such a loose grouping would not per se result in any significant reduction of the area's military vulnerability. However, together with US military aid programs, it would create greater opportunities than in the past for reducing existing Middle East defense deficiencies. The requirements for outside ground forces might eventually be significantly reduced. However, achievement of even this limited goal would be a long and costly operation, involving considerable training and equipment over a period of years, and effective Middle East defense will continue to depend for the foreseeable future on substantial Western force contributions.

7. Creation of a regional defense grouping would also facilitate eventual development of a formal defense organization with some form of direct US-UK participation. However, serious political difficulties arising from intraregional rivalries and distrust of Western participation would first have to be overcome.

8. Finally creation of even a loose regional defense grouping and related US aid programs would encourage development of a more favorable atmosphere for at least some working arrangements for Western base and operating rights. However, most states would remain reluctant to countenance peacetime US-UK base rights and would probably demand that such facilities remain under their control. Should the US push too fast or too far for commitments, it might jeopardize overall progress toward defense cooperation.

9. US arming of the Arabs and efforts to associate them with a regional grouping would arouse strong Israeli opposition and to that extent increase Arab-Israeli tensions. There would be increased danger of renewal of the Palestine war unless suitable precautions were taken to discourage Israeli aggression and possible future Arab military adventurism. Israel will press for US arms aid to counter such aid to the Arab states.

10. While further US moves in support of the "northern tier" concept would in some degree increase US-Indian tensions, it is unlikely that an open rift would develop between India and the US as a result of this factor alone. Should Pakistan be materially strengthened as a result of US aid, India also would seek to build up its own forces. In any event, it is extremely unlikely that India would move significantly closer to the Soviet Bloc.

11. The USSR will attempt to counteract US efforts to build a defense grouping in the Middle East, particularly if US bases are involved. The USSR would increase its political warfare activities in the Middle East and might exert pressure on such vulnerable points as Iran and Afghanistan. We believe, however, that the USSR would not feel itself sufficiently threatened to undertake major retaliatory actions such as invasion of either of these states.

[Here follows discussion of the reasons for reaching the above conclusions. These included a brief history earlier efforts to develop a Middle East regional defense organization; the factors operating to the advantage and disadvantage of a regional defense grouping based on the Turkish-Pakistan agreement; the prospects for adherence of other Middle East states to that agreement; the political and military consequences of the creation of a loose Middle East defense grouping; the probable reactions of other interested countries; and the consequences of the failure of current efforts to create a Middle East defense grouping.]

The Chargé in Pakistan (Emmerson) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET KARACHI, June 23, 1954—1 p. m.

1065. Prime Minister asked me call yesterday evening, showed me letter from UK HICOM proposing GOP send one representative from each Pakistan armed service to UK for general talks on Middle East defense with particular emphasis on shipping. Letter stated these talks were envisaged as continuing very close and frank discussions started between British chiefs of staff and General Iskander Mirza during latter's sojourn London. UK HICOM stated commitments would grow out of talks and he felt sure there be no objection from Americans. Letter referred to document on shipping provided by UK but which Prime Minister stated he has not received.

---

[1] Repeated to London.

Prime Minister said in view close United States-Pakistan relationship he did not wish reply British request before consulting us. In general he favorably inclined proposal, believes British could be particularly helpful with respect shipping since in case Pakistan were to make defense contribution it would be completely dependent on outside help for sea transportation. Prime Minister said, however, he did not wish any conflict between talks with British and United States military aid program. I expressed agreement latter point of view. said would be unfortunate if there were lack coordination on military discussions held with UK and with United States. Stated would seek Department reaction and advise him soonest. Prime Minister requested reply soon as possible so he can answer UK request.

UK HICOM has not discussed this matter with Embassy, but United States Army Attaché learned from his British opposite that British Chiefs of Staff felt they making useful progress in discussion with Mirza at time his recall for East Pakistan assignment.

Although UK HICOM stated no commitments involved in discussions seems clear they will have to be conducted on basis certain agreed assumptions, and they certain to crystallize Pakistan thinking to some extent. Mission of United States MAAG Pakistan [2] might thus be complicated from outset by existence of tacit UK-Pakistan understanding not completely consistent with United States objectives. In Embassy's view these considerations underline desirability early United States-UK staff talks aimed at developing agreed position on Middle East defense as preliminary to widening discussion to include Pakistan and Turkey.

If Department and Defense consider it desirable, Embassy believes we could reasonably request Pakistan's defer discussion with UK until United States MAAG established and has had opportunity review proposed initial aid program with Pakistanis. Appears also reasonable line for Pakistanis to take with British. On assumption that United States-UK staff talks will take place this summer, prior opportunity would thus be provided to work out agreed United States-UK position and minimize possible conflict of interests in Pakistan.

If United States-United Kingdom talks not to take place within next few months, Department may wish handle on some other basis. In any event, Embassy would appreciate prompt advice as to reply to make to Prime Minister.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Dorsey)

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 12, 1954.[1]

Subject: Turkey-Pakistan Pact and Military Aid for Iraq; Iraq-Syria Confederation.

Participants: Dr. Fadhil Jamali, Foreign Minister of Iraq
Musa Shabandar, Ambassador of Iraq
The Secretary
NE—Mr. Dorsey

After greeting Dr. Jamali, the Secretary expressed his satisfaction at the current status of American-Iraq relations, with particular emphasis on the recent arms agreement.[2] He remarked that we had concluded the agreement with the understanding that the military support of Iraq would not be used against Israel; and he emphasized the importance the U.S. placed on the northern tier defense concept, and our hope that Iraq would soon move toward association with the Turk-Pakistan Pact.

Dr. Jamali replied by referring to Iraq's long leadership in the defense of the Middle East against Communism; and he assured the Secretary that Iraq would not attack Israel unless she was attacked. Iraq, however, desired assurance that the U.S. would not allow and would punish aggression by Israel. Regarding the regional defense organization, Dr. Jamali said that the Iraqis hoped that through association with Turkey, Pakistan, and Iraq [Iran?] they may not only cooperate in the defense of the area against the danger from the north, but that they may see a change in the atmosphere of Turkey's association with Israel. They hoped that Turkey would cease being "partial" to Israel. He said that the Iraq government's problem was that of carrying its people with it in pro-Western moves such as the arms aid program and regional defense. He asked that initial shipment of US military equipment arrive in Iraq at the earliest practicable date in quantities which his countrymen would view as impressive and which they might readily identify as a U.S. contribution.

Dr. Jamali said he wished to bring to the Secretary's attention the movement for confederation of Iraq, Syria and Jordan,[3] a project which he hoped the U.S. Government would support. He described preliminary talks which he had recently had with certain Syrian leaders regarding Iraqi-Syrian confederation. The Syrian reception of the idea had been most favorable provided that they could obtain "a green light from the U.S.". If the U.S. grants such approval, he said, they promised that they are ready to become a part of the area defense system. Touching on the political instability of Syria, and the economic difficulties of Jordan, he stressed his belief that any successful steps towards unification would be good for the stability of the Middle East. The people are actually one from the point of view of race, culture and religion, and their unification in the field of economics, politics and defense would be a tremendous step towards the solidification and pacification of the Middle East. Based on careful calculations this confederation could provide 12 armed divisions for the defense of the area. Dr. Jamali asked the Secretary to consider the matter and let him have his reactions in as positive a sense as possible.

The Secretary replied that we would not wish to obstruct the peaceful will of the people concerned if they wished to take such steps. However, he saw certain difficulties. If Iraq joins with Syria and Jordan it will be associated with two countries which have common borders with Israel and the problems resulting therefrom. The Israeli problem would be further complicated by such action, and Iraq would become directly involved in the Jordan-Israel border problem. Dr. Jamali said that the adherence of Jordan, which involved special problems, to the confederation could be deferred. He stressed the economic aspects of Iraqi-Syrian confederation and pointed out Iraq's need for access to the Mediterranean and a united approach to the development of the Euphrates. Syria, on the other hand, needs the Iraq market for her products and her financial assistance and development. Reiterating that he would not oppose confederation if the peoples involved wished to undertake it peaceably, the Secretary said he would study the problem, although he could not say that it filled him with enthusiasm.

Dr. Jamali mentioned his hope that the U.S. would establish an educational institution in Iraq, saying that he had been assured that the Department would investigate the possibility of interesting the Rockefeller Foundation in the project. The Secretary said he would have the matter looked into.

Statement of Policy by the National Security Council [1]

NSC 5428

WASHINGTON, July 23, 1954.

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO THE NEAR EAST [*]

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. The Near East is of great strategic, political and economic importance to the free world. The area contains the greatest petroleum resources in the world; essential locations for strategic military bases in any world conflict against Communism; the Suez Canal; and natural defensive barriers. It also contains Holy Places of the Christian, Jewish, and Moslem worlds, and thereby exerts religious and cultural influences affecting people everywhere. The security interests of the United States would be critically endangered if the Near East should fall under Soviet influence or control.

2. Current conditions and trends in the Near East are inimical to Western interests. During recent years the prestige and position of the West have declined. The nations of the Near East are determined to assert their independence and are suspicious of outside interest in their affairs. In particular, the influence of the United Kingdom has been weakened, with distrust and hatred replacing

[1] A note by Executive Secretary of the NSC Lay stating that the National Security Council, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget had adopted NSC 5428 at the 207th meeting of the NSC on July 22, is not printed. The note further stated that the President directed the implementation of NSC 5428 by all appropriate executive departments and agencies of the U.S. Government and designated the Operations Coordinating Board as the coordinating agency.

NSC 5428 was composed of the statement of policy in NSC 155/1 (Document 145) and the statement of policy supplementary to NSC 155/1 contained in a memorandum for the NSC from Lay, dated July 6 (S/P-NSC (Memoranda), lot 61 D 167 "Near East (NSC 5428)"); amended by the Council in NSC Action No. 1184, July 22 (S/S-NSC files, lot 66 D 95, "Record of Actions by the NSC, 1954"). Neither the July 6 memorandum nor NSC Action No. 1184 is printed, but their substance is indicated in footnotes below.

A Financial Appendix, an NSC Staff Study, and a map of the Middle East were enclosed with the source text; none is printed.

[*] Includes Egypt, Yemen, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Israel, Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, the Arabian Peninsula Sheikdoms. Iran, the subject of a separate policy statement (NSC 5402), is not included. This paper takes into account the importance of Turkey and Pakistan to the Near East, particularly as regards defense of the area, but does not attempt full coverage of U.S. policies toward Turkey and Pakistan, which are included in other NSC reports (NSC 5402, NSC 109, and NSC 5409). [Footnote in the source text.]

the former colonial subservience. France is also disliked and distrusted because of her refusal to free Morocco and Tunisia and because of her former role as a mandate power in Syria and Lebanon. Some of the distrust of the United Kingdom and France has devolved upon the United States, as an ally of both. Even more important, the Arab nations are incensed by what they believe to be our pro-Israel policy. In addition, acute political and economic instability; military weakness; widespread unrest, Arab-Israel tensions, the UK controversies with Egypt, Iran and Saudi Arabia; the French North African problem; and the Soviet activity are also unfavorable to the West.

3. In the Near East the current danger to the security of the free world arises not so much from the threat of direct Soviet military attack as from a continuation of the present unfavorable trends. Unless these trends are reversed, the Near East may well be lost to the West within the next few years.

4. Efforts to prevent the loss of the Near East will require increasing responsibility, initiative, and leadership by the United States in the area. Even though British and French influence in the Near East has declined, the UK retains substantial interest, experience, and security positions, so that the United States will need to act in concert with the United Kingdom to the greatest extent practicable, while reserving the right to act with others (e.g., France and Turkey) or alone. It is important to the settlement of outstanding political disputes that the United States convince the Arab states that it is capable of acting independently of other Western states and of Israel.

5. The rate of economic growth and distribution of its benefits are among the important factors affecting internal stability, popular and leadership attitudes toward the Free World and Communism, and the maintenance of governments free of Communist control or influence. It is in U.S. interests to help guide the social and economic pressures for revolutionary change into channels leading to healthy economic growth while maintaining and improving political stability.[2]

[2] Paragraph 5 was recommended in the July 6 memorandum for the NSC from the Executive Secretary and added in the final text.

The July 6 memorandum had four parts. The cover sheet was the actual memorandum by Lay for the NSC, and there were three enclosures to it. The first two enclosures, the Proposed Amendments to the Statement of Policy in NSC 155/1 and a Supplementary Statement of Policy on the Arab-Israel Problem had been prepared by the NSC Planning Board on the basis of an initial draft by the Department of State. The third enclosure, Proposed Amendments to the Staff Study in NSC 155/1, was not attached to the July 6 memorandum found in Department of State files. There was a copy attached to another memorandum by Lay to the NSC Planning Board, dated June 29. (S/P-NSC (Memoranda), lot 61 D 167, "Near East (NSC 5428)").

6. a. An increase in military training and strength in the Near East would help to induce internal stability and political orientation towards the West, and may instill in the local peoples confidence in their ability to help protect themselves.

b. The best prospect for creating an indigenous regional defense arrangement in the Near East lies in the concept of the "northern tier", which would include Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq. The Turkish-Pakistan Pact is the first step in this direction. † Greater strength may be obtained in the initial stages by limiting the defense arrangements to the four states named. The concept has aroused resentment on the part of certain Arab states, especially Egypt and Saudi Arabia, but may provoke a desirable pull away from the negative Arab League.

c. The immediate effects of a regional defense arrangement may be expected to be primarily political and psychological rather than military. Such a grouping should strengthen Western-oriented elements and tend to bring about greater awareness of the Soviet threat and greater willingness to cooperate both regionally and with the West. However, it would not, in itself, materially affect the internal weaknesses which have thus far undermined Near East strength and stability.

d. Militarily, a regional defense arrangement together with U.S. military aid programs, may permit the eventual significant reduction of the requirement for outside ground forces. However, achievement of even this limited goal would be a long and costly operation, and effective Near East defense will continue to depend for the foreseeable future on substantial Western force contributions.

e. The indigenous nature of the organization is an essential feature. The creation of strength and self-reliance, regardless of whether any formal link to the West is established at this time, will be an important impediment to Soviet cold-war activities, including subversion. Until progress can be made in settling present disputes between the British, French and Arabs and until Arab resentment toward the West arising from the creation of Israel can be reduced, there is little possibility of including both the Arab states and the West (except Turkey) in a formal defense organization.

† The key security provisions of the Pact are:

Article 2. "The contracting parties will consult on international matters of mutual interest and, taking into account international requirements and conditions, cooperate between themselves to the maximum extent."

Article 4. "The consultation and cooperation between the contracting parties in the field of defense shall cover the following points:

A. Exchange of information for the purpose of deriving benefit jointly from technical experience and progress.

B. Endeavors to meet, as far as possible, the requirements of the parties in the production of arms and ammunition.

C. Studies and determination of the ways and extent of cooperation which might be effected between them in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, should an unprovoked attack occur against them from outside." [Footnote in the source text.]

f. Adherence of Iraq and Iran will require an improvement in the political climate in these states. In addition, the support of the British will be an important factor in determining the success of the "northern tier" concept. Efforts should be made to overcome the doubts now held by the UK, particularly regarding the inclusion of Iran.

g. U.S. military equipment available to strengthen the area should be channeled primarily to the "northern tier" states, and when appropriate to Egypt, which offer the best prospect of creating real strength. A large flaccid grouping, each member of which receives a nominal amount of military aid, will provide neither military strength nor political attraction.

h. Military aid plans must take into account the economic capabilities of the states receiving such aid. A rapid military build-up, even in selected countries, might have damaging economic and political effects.

i. Inclusion of Israel at this time would result in Arab refusal to cooperate. Moreover, U.S. arming of the Arabs and efforts toward a regional grouping would continue to arouse sharp Israel opposition and increase Arab–Israel tensions. Because of the present preponderance of Israel's military strength, arms aid to the Arab states would not materially change the power relationship for a considerable period, but adequate safeguards are desirable to prevent misuse in the future and justified concern by Israel. If these dangers can be met, successful development of the security arrangements should in the long run exert a helpful effect on the Arab–Israel problems. [3]

OBJECTIVES

7. Availability to the United States and its allies of the resources, the strategic positions, and the passage rights of the area, and the denial of such resources and strategic positions to the Soviet bloc.

8. Stable, viable, friendly governments in the area, capable of withstanding communist-inspired subversion from within, and willing to resist communist aggression.

9. Settlement of major issues between the Arab states and Israel as a foundation for establishing peace and order in the area.

10. Reversal of the anti-American trends of Arab opinion.

11. Prevention of the extension of Soviet influence in the area.

12. Wider recognition in the free world of the legitimate aspirations of the countries in the area to be recognized as, and have the status of, sovereign states, and wider recognition by such countries of their responsibility toward the area and toward the free world generally.

---

[3] This entire section 6, paragraphs a to i, was recommended in the July 6 memorandum and added in the final text.

GENERAL COURSES OF ACTION

13. The United States should:

a. Assume an increased share of responsibility toward the area, acting in concert with the United Kingdom to the greatest extent practicable, but reserving the right to act with others or alone.

b. Capitalize on such elements of strength as remain to the British in the area by such support of United Kingdom positions as may be consistent with U.S. principles and policy objectives.

c. Win the Arab states to a belief that we sympathize with their legitimate aspirations and respect their interests.

d. Increase its efforts to achieve a settlement of the political differences among the states of the area, and between them and the Western nations.

e. Seek to guide the revolutionary and nationalistic pressures throughout the area into orderly channels not antagonistic to the West, rather than attempt merely to preserve the status quo.

f. Stimulate measures of self-help, encourage the expansion of private investment, and provide somewhat increased economic and technical assistance.

g. Render limited military assistance.

h. Encourage the development of indigenous regional defense arrangements which will increase the stability and strengthen the security of the area. Be prepared eventually to participate in such arrangements, when the political climate in the area makes this practicable. [4]

i. Support leadership groups which offer the best prospect of orderly progress towards free world objectives. Seek to increase the participation of intellectuals in Western-oriented activities.

j. Make clear to the nations in the area the basically hostile intentions of the Soviet regime.

k. Strengthen cultural, educational and information programs.

. . . .

SPECIFIC COURSES OF ACTION

14. a. Saudi Arabia. The United States should strengthen its special position with respect to Saudi Arabia to an extent compatible with general U.S. policies in the area.

b. The United States should take all appropriate measures to bring about the cancellation of the agreement between the Saudi Arabian Government and Onassis for the transport of Saudi Arabian-produced oil and, in any case, to make the agreement ineffective. [5] [4] All of paragraphs h, k, and l, and the second sentence of paragraph i, were recommended in the July 6 memorandum.

---

A memorandum by Dorsey to Byroade, July 8, entitled Supplement and Amendments to NSC 155/1, stated that paragraph 1 had been added at the request of the CIA, and that it was a standard paragraph now appearing in NSC papers. (S/P–NSC (Memoranda), lot 61 D 167, "Near East (NSC 5428)").

15. Arab-Israel Tension [‡]

16. Egypt. The United States should:

a. In concert with the United Kingdom and Egypt, seek an early negotiated settlement of the Suez Canal base and related defense questions. Such a settlement should provide for withdrawal of British forces, but under conditions to insure the continued maintenance of the base and its availability to the Western Powers in the event of hostilities or grave threat thereof.

b. Take such steps, and secure the necessary commitments, as to best insure that the Suez Canal remains open to international trade.

c. As progress in reaching an Anglo-Egyptian settlement warrants, extend economic and military assistance to Egypt.

17. Area Defense. The U.S. should:

a. Develop secretly plans for the defense of the area with the UK, Turkey, and such others as may be desirable.

b. Conduct secret military-political conversations in the near future with the UK regarding development of the "northern tier" concept as an indigenous movement, not linked formally at this time with the Western Powers or with Western defense organizations except through the participation of Turkey.

c. Encourage when appropriate the adherence of Iraq and Iran to the Turkish-Pakistan Pact, avoiding pressure but endeavoring to create political conditions which will make adherence possible and attractive.

d. Associate Egypt with the defense arrangements should she so request, and make clear to her that the "northern tier" concept does not derogate from the importance the U.S. attaches to strengthening Egypt. Neither encourage nor discourage other Arab states from asking to participate in regional security arrangements. In order to avoid creating harmful friction, treat sympathetically any overtures made, but bear in mind the importance of maintaining the indigenous nature of the organization and the desirability of concentrating available U.S. military assistance. Pending the settlement of Arab–Israel tensions, refrain from supporting requests from Israel to join such defense arrangements.

[5] Two versions of this paragraph were included in the July 6 memorandum. The substitute draft proposed by the Department of State read: "The United States should continue to take steps to insure that the lifting and transport of Saudi Arabian oil for the United States armed forces by ships controlled or owned by the United States Government will remain unaffected by any restrictive agreement the Saudi Arabian Government may make for the shipment of Saudi Arabian oil." The draft proposed by the Department of Defense read: "The United States should obtain assurances from the Saudi Arabian Government that no agreement concluded by that government for the transport of Saudi Arabian-produced oil will interfere in any way with present or future arrangements for lifting of oil for the U.S. Armed Forces in ships controlled or owned by the U.S. Government." The paragraph in the source text is that adopted in NSC Action No. 1184 on July 22.

[‡] A detailed, supplementary statement of policy on the Arab-Israeli problem is attached. [Footnote in the source text.]

e. Continue military aid to the states forming the "northern tier" (Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq) and undertake military assistance to Egypt when developments regarding the Suez Base warrant it. Render military assistance at an appropriate later date to other Arab states depending on (1) their willingness to contribute to regional defense arrangements, (2) the effectiveness for such assistance in creating political and military strength, (3) the status of the Arab-Israel conflict. In addition, military assistance may be provided where it may be necessary to further specific U.S. security interests such as transit and base rights. Control the scope, character and phasing of military assistance to minimize the possibility of its use for aggressive purposes; and furnish military aid only after receiving appropriate guarantees against its use for aggression. Consider the politico-economic situation in plans for military build-up which might require appropriate measures to prevent damaging political and economic effects.

f. When politically feasible, seek to obtain transit and base rights where required within the area, and, upon the threat of and during general hostilities, the right to operate forces in the territories of the various nations of the area.

g. If formal U.S. commitments with respect to the regional defense arrangements, or association of the arrangement with other defense organizations of the Western Powers, should appear desirable, appropriate proposals should be submitted for Council consideration. [6]

18. Economic Aid. The United States should:

a. Give somewhat increased economic aid so as to provide a base for necessary economic development, encourage the concept of self-help and mutual cooperation, and contribute to the settlement of disputes in the area. Maintain flexibility in the use of available funds on a regional basis so as to take advantage of changing developments in an unstable area.

b. Encourage Near Eastern governments to recognize that the bulk of the capital required for their economic development can best be supplied by private enterprise and public banking facilities, and that their own self-interest requires the creation of a climate which will attract private investment.

c. Continue to provide limited financial assistance towards the settlement of the Arab refugee problem.

d. Continue limited technical assistance with emphasis on increased food production, and better health, education, communications, and transportation. Encourage private foundations and industry to provide technical assistance for the same purposes.

[6] This entire section 17, paragraphs a to g, was a revision of the original, proposed in the July 6 memorandum. Following this section in the July 6 memorandum was a note stating that the paragraphs in NSC 5402 on Iran and NSC 5409 on South Asia dealing with the security of the area did not conflict with this statement of policy and required no change.

e. Encourage the wise use by each country of its oil royalties to promote a more stable and viable economy. In this regard, consideration should be given to the establishment of an area-wide development fund, in which the West would participate, and through which states having no oil resources might benefit from those who have.

f. Progressively reduce the amount of economic aid furnished to Israel, so as to bring it in to impartial relationship to aid to others in the area.

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT OF POLICY ON THE ARAB–ISRAEL PROBLEM

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

During the past year tensions have increased between the Arab states and Israel, and the Soviet Union has stepped up its activities in the Near East. The point has been reached where new means should be sought to alleviate the situation, not only because of the seriousness of the Arab–Israel problem per se, but in order to preclude the danger of the loss of the Near East by the West.

2. A definitive peace between the Arab states and Israel should continue to be the ultimate objective of the U.S., but it is unrealistic to hope for a permanent settlement in the early future because of presently irreconcilable basic attitudes. The U.S. approach should be gradual and practical.

3. On the Arab side, small-scale infiltration persists on the part of individuals and small groups acting on their own responsibility. There is no evidence of organized military activity by the Arab states acting in concert or by any individual Arab state. On the other hand, the Israel Government, concerned at the failure of its efforts to secure peace on the basis of the status quo, appears to be following a deliberate policy of reprisals based on the theory that matters will have to be made worse before they become better. Divided counsels exist within Israel over how far the risk of open warfare should be carried, and danger exists that Israel's present tactics will lead to open fighting either by accident or through deliberate resort to preventive war.

4. Each side is fearful that the other possesses aggressive intentions. The Arabs doubt that the U.S., UK and France will act to restrain Israel and read with foreboding of Israel efforts to stimulate immigration. Israel is alarmed at the recent steps indicative of the U.S. impartial attitude, which Israel interprets as a change from traditional U.S. friendship. Her concern is intensified by the U.S. program of arms aid to the Arabs, which she fears may diminish her present military superiority, and encourage an eventual Arab attack.

5. Reduction of border tensions and effective assurances to both sides against aggression are prerequisites to progress towards a peaceful settlement. These tasks are beyond the capacity of the parties acting by themselves. Despite continued U.S. support, the UN alone also appears incapable of coping with the problem in view of its loss of prestige in the area and in the face of current Soviet obstructionism. Therefore, the U.S. Government, in association with other powers, is impelled to assume responsibility in developing solutions and ensuring their implementation. The measures taken should be commensurate in scope and firmness with the seriousness of the problem, and should serve: (1) to deter Israel from embarking upon aggression as a preventive measure while she has military superiority; (2) to allay the fears of Israel with respect to the possibility of Arab aggression following a program of arms aid to the Arab countries; (3) to deter the Arab countries from giving serious consideration to aggressive actions against Israel following the receipt of arms. Much of the effectiveness of these measures as a deterrent depends on the extent to which the U.S. is prepared to declare itself openly.

6. To accomplish its objective of bringing the Near East behind the Iron Curtain the USSR is striving to create chaos and to nullify the influence of the Western Powers. Recently concluded trade agreements, industrial fairs, public announcements, and, particularly, actions in the UN, reflect the increased USSR attention to the area. Continuation of the present trend toward consistent and open championship of the Arabs would give the USSR an effective and inexpensive means of improving its position in the area. Should a further deterioration of the security situation occur, the resulting unrest would provide the USSR with manifold opportunities for improving its position. Should Israeli aggression occur and the Western Powers fail to restore the situation, a decisive movement of the area away from the West and possibly into the Soviet sphere of influence must be anticipated.

7. Collaboration with the UK in developing and implementing area policies is important. Although UK influence has declined, Britain retains substantial interests and assets. Of particular significance is the Anglo-Jordanian Defense Treaty, under which Britain has informed Israel she will act in case of any Israel attack on Jordan. While France may be expected to provide little effective help, her association in the Tripartite Declaration of May 1950 suggests assigning her a nominal role if possible without impairing the measures we regard as necessary. Turkey, a member of the Palestine Conciliation Commission, might play a useful role but here effectiveness would be counter-balanced in part by Arab suspicions of Turkish aspirations in the Near East.

8. Progress on the Arab-Israel problem would affect significantly the willingness of states in the area to participate in indigenous collective security arrangements for defense against Soviet aggression. Concomitant development of security arrangements should ultimately serve to place the Arab–Israel question in its proper perspective and diminish the predominant preoccupation of the Arab states with Israel.

OBJECTIVES

(Supplementary to those in the basic paper)

9. a. To deter an armed attack by Israel or by the Arab states, and if an armed attack should occur to force the attacking state to relinquish any territory seized.

b. To reduce current Arab–Israel tensions and promote an eventual clear-cut peace between the Arab states and Israel.

c. To alleviate the Arab refugee problem.

COURSES OF ACTION [7]

. . . .

14. Pursue actively, both directly and through the UN, measures to establish tranquility along the Arab–Israel armistice line, working in collaboration to the extent desirable and feasible with the UK and France.

15. Use U.S. influence to secure Arab–Israel boundary settlements, whch may include some concessions by Israel.

16. Cooperate in seeking a fair settlement of the status of Jerusalem and the Holy Places in Palestine, acceptable to the states directly involved and to most nations of the free world.

17. Maintain both the fact and appearance of impartial friendship with the Arab states and Israel, avoiding preferential treatment of any state and demonstrating equal interest in the wellbeing of each.

18. Seek by all appropriate means to secure an agreed and equitable division of the waters of the Jordan river system between Israel and the interested Arab states and the establishment of an international control authority. Take such steps as may be feasible to ensure that neither party prejudices the allocation of the available waters by an international control authority. Link the development of the Jordan Valley to Arab refugee resettlement to the maximum extent practicable.

19. With respect to Israel:

a. Take such measures as are feasible to convince the Israelis, and their U.S. supporters, of the inadvisability, from the standpoint of Israel's national interests, (1) of trying to win a better situation in the Near East by force; (2) of resuming large-scale Jewish immigration into Israel; (3) of doctrines implying an intent to dominate the Near East.

b. While progressively reducing the amount of economic aid furnished to Israel, so as to bring it into impartial relationship to aid to others in the area, exert pressure on Israel to adopt the financial measures necessary for progressing as rapidly as possible toward a self-sustaining economy, and continue to assist Israel toward viability.

c. Continue to urge Israel to accept a limited number of Arab refugees and to work out promptly arrangements for the release of blocked Arab funds and for the payment of reasonable compensation to the Arab refugees at an appropriate time, preferably in connection with actual resettlement or repatriation.

20. With respect to the Arab states:

a. Attempt to move forward as rapidly as is practicable on the Arab refugee problem by such means as resettlement in the Arab states or outside the Near East. To the extent feasible, work through the UN Relief Works Agency.

b. Continue economic and technical aid in conformity with paras. 17 [18]-a, c, and d of the above general policy statement on the Near East, emphasizing projects facilitating the resettlement of Arab refugees.

c. Extend military aid in conformity with par. 16 [17]-e of the above general policy statement on the Near East. Inform the Arab states that the U.S. may state publicly that their assurances against aggression are applicable to all countries, including Israel.

d. Work for eventual elimination of the Arab economic boycott of Israel; resist Arab efforts to impose a secondary boycott on U.S. trade with Israel; continue support for the Security Council resolution calling for removal of Egyptian restrictions on Suez Canal traffic to Israel; help to restore normal commercial intercourse, and surface and air transportation between Israel and the Arab states.

e. Make clear to the Arabs that we cannot accept their negative attitude toward proposals involving recognition of the existence of Israel and their refusal to consider the possibility of an eventual settlement. While reminding the Arabs that peace is the ultimate objective, exercise caution lest stress on this goal prevent Arab acceptance of the necessary intermediate steps.

21. In addition to the foregoing, use political, economic, and psychological measures to bring about in the long run a progressive reduction in tension between the Arab states and Israel leading to conditions under which ultimate peace may be secured.

Editorial Note

A May 12 memorandum by James S. Lay, Jr., to the National Security Council noted that in response to a request from the Operations Coordinating Board the President had on that day designated it as the coordinating agency for NSC 155/1, the current NSC policy on the Near East. (S/S-NSC files, lot 63 D 351, "NSC 155 Memoranda") A May 18 paper by the Operations Coordinating Board, entitled "Terms of Reference for Working Group on Coordination of NSC 155/1 (Near East)," stated that a working group had been formed to assist the Board in its task. The chairman of the working group was to come from the Department of State. Other members of the group, besides the OCB staff, would be representatives of the Department of State, Department of Defense, Foreign Operations Administration, Central Intelligence Agency, United States Information Agency, and other agencies when appropriate, as determined by the Executive Officer. The first consolidated report, covering the period through June 30, 1954, was to be submitted to the Executive Officer of the Operations Coordinating Board on July 1, with subsequent reports due at least every 6 months after (OCB files, lot 62 D 430, "Near East, 1954-5")

On July 2, a draft Progress Report on NSC 155/1, dated July 1, was submitted by Parker T. Hart, Chairman of the Operations Coordinating Board Working Group on NSC 155/1, to the Executive Officer. A July 7 memorandum by Elmer B. Staats, the Executive Officer, to the National Security Council Board Assistants, transmitted the July 1 Progress Report for consideraton by them at a July 16 meeting. Another draft Progress Report, dated July 16, contained some changes from the July 1 Report, but there was no notation on the document to indicate whether the changes were made as a result of the July 16 Planning Board meeting or not. (OCB files, lot 62 D 430, "Near East, 1954-5")

The final copy of the Progress Report, dated July 29, is printed infra.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, July 29, 1954.

PROGRESS REPORT ON NSC 155/1 UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES AND POLICIES WITH RESPECT TO THE NEAR EAST

(Policy approved by the President July 11, 1953)

A. SUMMARY OF MAJOR ACTIONS

Major factors limiting the ability of the U.S. to carry out the courses of action specified were the deterioration of the Arab-Israel situation, and the difficulties encountered by the UN in dealing with the problem; lack of progress in resolving disputes between the Arab states and the U.K. and France; and the growing activity of the USSR. Major accomplishments include the Turkish-Pakistan Pact, the military assistance agreement with Iraq, implementation of the U.S. policy of impartiality between the Arab states and Israel, and progress toward securing acceptance of a unified plan for the development of the Jordan River system.

The conclusion of grant military aid agreements with Iraq and Pakistan, as well as U.S. support of the Turkey–Pakistan Mutual Assistance Pact, have been initial contributions to the development of a politico-military climate favorable to the eventual development of a regional defense organization including Western and Middle East powers. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have agreed on objectives for the defense of the Middle East and subsequently have proposed to the British Chief of Staff that it would be profitable at this time to make military planning studies for the defense of the Middle East with the U.K. and Turkey. The Military Services of the United States and the United Kingdom have coordinated their operating requirements in Egypt, Aden and Jordan.

[1] The source text is part of the record copy of a National Security Council document entitled "Progress Report on United States Objectives and Policies With Respect to the Near East by the Operations Coordinating Board," dated July 30, 1954. Included in the document is a July 30 memorandum by George A. Morgan, Acting Executive Officer of the OCB, to the Executive Officer of the National Security Council, transmitting the report. The Morgan memorandum stated that the report was approved by the Operations Coordinating Board on July 28. It also noted that the amended version of NSC 155/1 had been circulated as NSC 5428 and assigned to the OCB, and that subsequent progress reports would be concerned with the implementation of NSC 5428. Also attached to the Progress Report was an annex entitled "Detailed Development of Major Actions," not printed.

Another copy of the report, found in the OCB files, was attached to a memorandum, dated Sept. 29, 1954, from Staats to the OCB. The memorandum stated that the report was noted and discussed by the NSC on Sept. 2, 1954, in NSC Action No. 1211. (OCB files, lot 62 D 430, "Near East, 1954–[illegible]) The Record of Actions by the National Security Council at its 212th meeting on Sept. 2, merely notes that the NSC noted and discussed the Progress Report. (S/S–NSC files, lot 66 D 95, "Record of Actions by the NSC, 1954")

USIA operates in Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria and Iraq. Budget and strategic considerations have decided against the operation of programs in the other countries.

B. POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

In the light of operating experience, these policies in general remain valid; but a draft supplement has been submitted by the Department of State to the NSC treating in greater detail the Arab-Israel problem.

C. EMERGING PROBLEMS AND FUTURE ACTIONS

Two major emerging problems which either singly or in combination demand firmer and more decisive measures to control the situation are: (1) increased USSR activity in the area, and particularly Soviet support of the Arab position versus Israel; and (2) growing Arab–Israel tensions carrying with them real danger of an outbreak of open fighting. Special attention may also be necessary to the Anglo–Egyptian dispute over the Suez Base, and the general deterioration of our relations with Saudi Arabia, particularly the Onassis Agreement.

The immediate objectives of the USSR in the area are to create chaos and to nullify the influence of the Western powers. The recent vetoes cast in the Security Council against resolutions to which the Arabs objected provided the USSR with an effective and inexpensive means of improving its position. Should the USSR consistently support the Arabs in the United Nations, the effectiveness of that organization in dealing with the Arab–Israel problem will be reduced further. Other examples of USSR activity include trade agreements, industrial fairs, stepped up propaganda activities, public statements favorable to the Arabs, and the recent strike at the Aramco installations at Dhahran in which evidence suggests the Communists had a hand.

The recent deterioration in Saudi Arabia–United States relations, while perhaps of a temporary nature, would, if the process were protracted, raise the question whether the Saudi Government intends to renew in 1956 our Air Force Base rights at Dhahran. The increasing demand for money, complicated by misuse and bad administration of funds, will result in redoubling of efforts by the Saudi Government to squeeze Aramco or to come to arrangements with third parties at Aramco's expense. The determination of the courses which should be followed to check and reverse this deterioration in our relations involves the questions of our attitude toward the Onassis Agreement and of the effect on Saudi Arabia of current United States policies towards other states of the area. A thorough study by the Department of State of this matter is in process.

The United States will be required to determine the most appropriate manner in which to pay for military base and other similar rights in the area. A similar problem exists in regard to our bases in North Africa. At present, no direct payment is made for the only base in the Middle East area, the Air Force Base at Dhahran. It is questionable whether paying for base rights by extending economic aid is the most desirable means of concluding future agreements from the point of view of either relations with the states involved or presentation of appropriation requests to the Congress. With respect to Saudi Arabia, the late King [2] preferred not to demand direct payment for base rights in the belief that this would reflect on the dignity of Saudi Arabia and would prevent him from maintaining the fiction that in reality the United States has no base right, but is merely acting as an agent for Saudi Arabia in the operation of a landing field. The late King expected "payments" in terms of general political support by the United States Government.

The United States may find it desirable to urge the United Kingdom to station a portion of the combat forces withdrawn from the Suez Base after an agreement with Egypt in other locations in the Near East which are strategically effective.

In return for continued support of such United Kingdom positions in the area as may be consistent with United States principles and policy objectives, the United States may be required to find means of obtaining greater United Kingdom support of United States political, military and economic objectives in the Near East.

The Saudi Arab Agreement with the A. S. Onassis interests to form a maritime company for shipment of Saudi Arabian oil directly threatens U.S. interests. In addition to the adverse effect on American companies, the future operation of U.S. Government-owned tankers now carrying oil for the U.S. Navy may well be jeopardized. The ultimate solution of this and similar problems is necessarily bound up with future developments in U.S.-Saudi Arab relations.

The Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) to the Ambassador in Turkey (Warren)

TOP SECRET OFFICIAL–INFORMAL WASHINGTON, undated.[1]

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Following the Istanbul Conference, we converted the substance of the conference recommendations on area defense and on Arab–Israel issues into NSC papers for Council consideration.[2] Final action was taken on July 22, 1954[3] and the conference conclusions were confirmed in general with one exception. In the Arab–Israel paper, the Council approved taking the three economic steps in case of aggression, but determined that decisions regarding the establishment of a blockade and use of military force should be made at the time of aggression.

It is important that you realize that this exception to the conference recommendations indicates no lack of determination on the part of the United States to take such steps as might be necessary under the circumstances should aggression occur. The action taken indicates rather that no exception can be made to the established principle that decisions within our Government upon the use of force cannot be made prior to actual events and consideration of all the factors of the situation at that time.

I consider that these papers considerably advance United States policy in the Middle East. Copies of the documents will be forwarded to you in accordance with security regulations.

Sincerely yours,

HANK

The Chargé in Iraq (Ireland) to the Department of State [1]

SECRET BAGHDAD, August 22, 1954—10 a. m.

105. Conversations with Prime Minister Nuri and members of his government indicate that Nuri and Iraqi Government following Iraqi-Egyptian conversations and agreements are moving away from Turk-Pakistan pact and multilateral arrangements involving Pakistan, Great Britain (Embtel 86, August 17, 1954) [2] toward plan invoking Arab Collective Security Pact modified in accordance with Article 51 of the UN charter and expanded to permit membership to non-Arab states. This proposal, given in more detail below, is to be placed before UK and US for their consideration and comments before action by Iraq and Egypt.

As background, Nuri said Egyptians at Sersank had indicated that with signature of Anglo-Egyptian agreement, [3] their hostile attitude toward Iraq and to cooperation of Arab states with west had altered. They now saw merit in cooperation with west and were even ready to work toward it.

Egyptians at Sersank opposed Turk-Pakistan pact as well as multilateral arrangements with Pakistan which Nuri admitted he had in mind (reftel). They argued in particular that Pakistan was neither militarily nor geographically analogous any Arab state. When Egyptians asked for alternative proposal as basis for Arab cooperation with west, Nuri said he had brought forward Arab collective security pact, to be suitably modified to meet spirit of Article 51 of UN charter and to permit membership of non-Arab states as Turkey, Great Britain, Iran and Pakistan and even United States. He said he had been surprised at welcome given his proposal by Egyptians.

[2] Telegram 68 from Baghdad, Aug. 9, reported the Egyptian Minister of National Guidance, Maj. Saleh Salem, was expected to arrive in Baghdad on Aug. 13 with a party of about 20. They planned to visit the King and Crown Prince at Sersank for a few days and then go to Baghdad. (674.87/8-954)

Telegram 86 reported that Nuri intended to review Iraq's foreign policy, not just "Arab policy" with Salem. He intended to propose alteration of the Arab League Collective Security Pact to permit the inclusion of Pakistan, Great Britain, and the United States. If Egypt refused to accept that, Nuri would counter with a proposal that would leave Iraq free to set up a regional defense plan, initially with Pakistan, but later to be expanded to include the Arab States, the United Kingdom, and possibly the United States. (674.87/8-1754)

[3] Regarding the Heads of Agreement between Egypt and the United Kingdom, signed on July 27, 1954, see Document 1348.

Prime Minister said agreement subsequently reached along following lines:

1. ACSP would be modified and expanded along lines given above. Arab states would pledge troops and military support to other Arab states in case of aggression from whatever source. Since Arab public opinion opposed sending troops abroad, they would give only general support to non-Arab states while such states would pledge similar support to Arabs in event aggression. Britain and US might confine themselves to military aid and technical support in peace time and to aid and such forces as were feasible in case of aggression.

2. One function of new pact would be to prepare for peace with Israel in accordance with UN resolutions, not in exact terms of such resolutions but rather in their spirit. If Israel sincerely wanted peace it should show itself in a conciliatory and peace-minded mood. It was entirely a matter of how much Israel really wanted peace. Arabs could not be forced into making peace but Israel could have peace any time it was ready to talk along UN resolution line.

3. This proposal for modified ACSP would be submitted to UK and US for their comment and advice through their embassies in Baghdad by Iraq Government and in Cairo by Egyptian Government Nuri had informed UK Chargé. He was not [now?] informing me with request that information be forwarded to Department. Salem would contact Ambassadors Caffery and Stevenson.

Prime Minister said US reaction and comment on following points particularly desired: (a) What was US attitude in general to ACSP suitably modified and expanded to include non-Arab countries: Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Great Britain and US?

(b) What suggestions could US make as to alterations, deletions, or additions to text of pact to enable it to accomplish this new objective and to win US adherence? Nuri said US draft of desired changes would be most welcome.

(c) Would US adhere to such pact if modified in direction desired by US? He hoped that US would adhere. It would benefit Middle East countries and West and should settle fears of Jewish world concerning peace and safety of Israel.

(d) What was US attitude toward inclusion of France? He believed France should not be asked and hoped that we would not insist. Its influence in Syria and presence in NA [North Africa] were distasteful to all Arabs. If a member it would be continuous source of irritation and trouble.

4. Until comments of US and UK had been received no action would be taken by Iraq or Egypt nor would proposals and comments be communicated to other Arab states.

5. Egypt and Iraq would meet in Cairo September 15 to consider replies of US and UK Governments. [4]

Prime Minister said he hoped US and UK would react favorably. He was supporting the plan because: (1) Objectives of Turkish-Pakistan pact would be achieved more quickly and completely plus advantage of bringing Arab world into Middle East regional defense system immediately, which he understood had been eventual objective of Turkish-Pakistan pact.

---

[4] See telegram 358 from Cairo, Document 229.

(2) Plan would accomplish objective of MEDO which West had put forward in 1951 and while Egypt had rejected and other Arab countries had found objectionable, it had merit, which MEDO did not have, of being put forward by Arab states as indigenous plan.

(3) As an indigenous plan it would be difficult for Arab countries to reject, while Turkish-Pakistan pact would be hard to sell Arab peoples and to ratify.

(4) Place of Israel and its reaction had been carefully considered. Nuri thought pact had merit of concentrating attention Arab states on Soviet menance and diverting it from Israel. Israel's position under pact should be better than under MEDO. Pact would be in accordance with Article 51 of UN charter and therefore under watchful eye of UN as well as to non-Arab members. Peace with Israel was considered as integral part of the new arrangement.

Nuri said he wanted to make it clear that in putting forward this scheme he was not abandoning principle of regional defense which lay behind Turkish-Pakistan pact. He was still 100 percent for this principle but he believed that the proposal would have great advantages over existing plans.

When asked what effect he thought proposal would have on Anglo–Iraqi treaty, he said that if Great Britain joined pact, the bilateral treaty would be no longer necessary and could be abandoned. The two air bases would, of course, revert to Iraq but agreements drafted by technicians would regulate their use by Great Britain and all other signatories of the pact.

He thought Great Britain would approve and join new pact. It provided a new basis whereby its relations with Iraq could be firmly established. Great Britain had always valued its influence in the Persian Gulf region and its adherence to pact would restore its influence there as well as among the Arab states.

In conclusion, he again expressed hope that Department would react favorably to the proposal.

Embassy comment follows.[5]

110. Embassy aware that Iraqi-Egyptian proposals regional defense scheme (Embassy's 105, August 22) [2] lack essential details, propose undertakings without indicating how they may be implemented, and give no indication exact degree of agreement between Iraq and Egypt re their firm intentions. Proposals are also disappointing in light of Nuri's previous forthright support for Turkish-Pakistani pact (Embassy's 590, April 5).[3] Nevertheless, proposals have merit of committing Egypt to cooperation with West, of being plan indigenously initiated by countries in area, and of opening prospect accomplishing our policy objectives in this area along lines discussed in NIE 30-54. [4]

Department will, therefore, doubtless wish to give its careful consideration to proposals for these and for additional reasons below:

1. Plan possesses valuable psychological advantages in Arab States because of its indigenous origin.
2. Egypt and Iraq have taken US and UK into their confidence from the beginning. Outright rejection by US could cause high resentment, particularly should UK consider participation.
3. Nuri genuinely wants our ideas on modifications text ACSP. Opportunity thus given US to shape pact and to prevent it at least from having unacceptable features whether or not we adhere. Moreover, Iraqi and Egyptian reaction to our specific suggestions should provide measure of their real willingness to work toward effective regional defense organization.
4. Our presence as member or associate in new grouping would enable us, in company with other non-Arab participants, to restrain and guide Arabs re Israel more effectively than heretofore and should thereby allay fears of Israel.
5. If new pact really provides basis for peace with Israel, attention whole area could then be turned toward Soviet threat. Although Iraqi-Egyptian conditions re peace with Israel as given by Nuri still represent obstacle, acknowledgement of necessity for peace with Israel deserves recognition and encouragement.
6. Turkish-Pakistani pact will continue to exist. If new scheme bogs down after reasonable period of time we would still be in strong position to argue forcefully that, in view unsuccessful Egyptian and Iraqi efforts to create regional defense group including

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 23, 1954.

I am greatly disturbed over the report that Iraq is planning a security pact with Egypt and is moving away from the idea of joining up with Turkey and Pakistan.

We bought the idea of military aid to Iraq on the theory that it was going to tie up with the northern tier countries and not merely build up the Arab League as against Israel.

When the Iraqi Prime Minister was here, he told me of the projected union with Syria and Lebanon, and I told him that because this would bring their influence to the Israel border, I thought it should be preceded by their moving along with Turkey and Pakistan. I understood him to indicate that he would do so. Now this proposal of joining with Egypt to strengthen the Arab Collective Security Pact comes up. I frankly do not like it and I believe it might cause us to invoke the Iraq Mutual Security Agreement provision that we may review our military aid in the light of the international situation at the time.

On the basis of available information, the Foreign Office was inclined to welcome the Iraqi-Egyptian proposals on the grounds that a lessening of tension between Iraq and Egypt was a good sign. They considered it encouraging that non-Westerners were suggesting a regional organization that would invite Western participation. A British official commented that the Suez settlement had made Great Britain more optimistic about building on the Arab League and less favorable to the northern tier concept, although it did not necessarily consider the two inconsistent. it was premature to approach US and UK before Egypt and Iraq had reached full agreement between themselves and had consulted other Arab states on plans for revision ALCSP.

He said Salah Salim had pointed out that Iraq desires early action to strengthen its Northern defenses and that Sarsank proposals would have advantage (a) of providing substitute for present Anglo-Iraqian treaty and (b) avoiding involvement in Turkey-Pakistan pact.

Ambassador said Nasir twice told Salah Salim he had been informed by "reliable American source" that US had given up idea of Arab adherence to Turkey-Pakistan pact. After some inconclusive discussion, Nasir said Egyptians would have to discuss matter further among themselves and would get in touch with Iraqian Ambassador again soon.

We of course, assured Ambassador that Nasir had not had his information from us and made it clear there has been no change in US thinking re Turkey-Pakistan pact.

Egyptian source close to Nasir confirms substance of Al Rawi's account. Source states however that Salah Salim walked in on meeting unexpectedly with result that full extent his commitments at Sarsank finally revealed to Nasir, who terminated meeting in order permit GOE get its lines straight.

[2] Telegram 319 from Cairo, Sept. 9, reported the Egyptian Cabinet the previous evening had granted Maj. Salah Salem a month's leave. No public explanation was given, but the Embassy considered the move a clear way of facing the fact that Salem had exceeded his authority in the Sersank talks. It suggested the action was a way of putting Nuri Said on notice that the Egyptian Government did not consider itself bound by any commitments made by Salem. (780.5/9-954) erhood they cannot at this juncture take any steps to put them into effect; they must wait until sometime after the final agreement with British signed, but they did not specify how long they would have to wait. Nuri's reply was "that's very well and I will do nothing to prevent your putting your own ideas into effect so long as they are in accordance with Articles 51 and 52 of the UN charter. However I cannot wait. Iraq is in an exposed position. I must do something. But whenever I do something I shall have in mind that eventually Egyptians might participate in it". He said that on that they shook hands all round and left each other with smiles.

I said "What had you in mind?" He said "Nothing very definite. I shall talk a bit with Pakistan and Iran; eventually Turkey, and afterwards possibly Lebanon and Syria. Jordan has an agreement with British. Had word last week from the Shah of Iran that he would like to take part in a regional pact. Perhaps I shall suggest a pact with Iraq and Pakistan, and then little later Turkey, or perhaps a pact with Pakistan and Iran and Turkey, and eventually Syria and Lebanon. I mean to go ahead. In any circumstances, whatever I do will be in accordance with Articles 51 and 52 of the UN charter".

Obviously this is all something less than concrete and direct, but patently his thoughts are not as yet well defined. Obviously, too, he was disappointed with the Egyptians. He had believed that with his superior knowledge and experience he could bring them into line.

said Prime Minister returns from Germany to Istanbul today to meet Nuri Said, Iraqi Prime Minister, who arrives this evening. Conversations expected last over next four days.

Zorlu then said there have been two developments in Iraqi attitude since my conversation with Prime Minister September 30 (Embtel 368).[3] When Abdul-Illah was leaving Turkey Zorlu accompanied him to airport. In conversation at that time Abdul-Illah expressed view it would be desirable for Nuri Said and Prime Minister Menderes explore possibilities of reaching decision on Turco-Iraqi bilateral defense pact rather than attempt move Iraq at this time into Turco-Pakistan agreement. If this idea worked out then Iraqis would propose similar bilateral pact with Pakistan at suitable moment in future. The two pacts might be combined within framework of Turco-Pakistan agreement.

When Zorlu reported this conversation to Prime Minister it was agreed idea appeared worth exploring and Zorlu instructed Turk Ambassador London seek ascertain nature Nuri Said's conversation there to verify if preparatory talks possibly leading in this direction.

Much to surprise of Turks they now advised from London that Nuri Said explored possibility quite new arrangement first with Eden, then with French Ambassador in London, and later with French Prime Minister in Paris. Such information as Turks have, indicates nebulous idea apparently based on effort by Nuri Said revive original MEDO concept in modified form. He suggested, according to the Turks information, that if French approved re Syria then he would explore defense arrangement to include Britain, Iraq, Pakistan, Syria and France.

While not expressed, it was implied that Turks and US would be requested give their support to idea. Turks understand Nuri Said formulated this idea following his conversations in Egypt when Nasir supposed to have expressed view that since Iraq more exposed than Egypt it might feel free enter into special defensive arrangements secure northern frontier against Soviet attack.

Since Prime Minister absent in Germany Zorlu sent for British Ambassador and inquired if he knew anything about Nuri Said's conversations in London. Bowker told him in first interview that there appeared be some nebulous plan afoot but he not aware of details. He would inquire of London and inform Zorlu early as possible. Yesterday Bowker visited Zorlu again and confirmed substance Nuri Said's conversations with Eden in London and with French Government in Paris. He intimated Nuri Said has draft proposal which he may bring to Menderes' attention when they meet in Istanbul. Zorlu said Bowker expressed view this idea still nebulous. In his London conversations, Nuri Said had considered it worthwhile developing since, if carried out, it would permit UK conclude new defense arrangement with Iraq under umbrella of proposed area defense arrangements and would not require Nuri Said present new Anglo-Iraq bilateral security pact to Iraqi parliament with incidental risk of bitter debate. Bowker said that as alternative to this arrangement Nuri Said might suggest to Turks pact between Iraq, Pakistan and British, followed at later date by bi-lateral pact between Iraq and Turkey.

Zorlu's reaction to these proposals is negative. He feels strongly that best feature of Turco-Pakistan agreement is indigenous initiative as against outside sponsorship and participation which made MEDO proposal sound appealing to Middle East countries. In his opinion it desirable that Menderes in forthcoming discussions with Nuri Said move towards bilateral arrangement between Turkey and Iraq calculated promote security their common frontier against Soviet aggression. He perceives no objection, if this can be done, to Iraq seeking bilateral agreement with Pakistan. Should this be done he believes situation would be possible at suitable moment to tie both agreements into Turco-Pakistan agreement. He believes further that forthcoming conversations in Istanbul must take into account weight of British power and importance British interests in Middle East and said Turks realize these facts and will do nothing impede British participation in development of Middle East defense area. He does have strong reservations on value modified MEDO proposal put forward by Nuri Said. He considers it unfortunate Nuri Said has made overtures to French and has attempted associate Iraq and Syria in this proposed arrangement.

Zorlu promised keep me currently informed of conversations as they develop in Istanbul.

I had not yet seen London's 1724, October 5[4] to Department when I had my conversation with Zorlu this morning. Bowker and I had lengthy conversation last night at dinner given by Turkish Chief of Staff for Marshal Montgomery. Conversation dealt exclusively with inquiries by Bowker re current Turkish financial and economic difficulties and did not touch on any political subject.

1851. From further discussion with Foreign Office of proposals put forward in London by Nuri Said recently [2] re Middle East regional security, Embassy believes outline of proposals contained Embtel 1724 [3] and Embdes 958 [4] is substantially accurate and that Turkish Government version outlined Ankara's 393 [5] is not entirely correct.

Foreign Office has shown us circular telegram to British Ambassadors at certain Middle East posts which Bowker was authorized use in his conversation with Zorlu mentioned Ankara reference telegram. Version of Nuri's proposals as given in Foreign Office circular corresponds to that given Embassy by Foreign Office and reported in our telegram and despatch under WGF.

Foreign Office considers Nuri's proposals could hardly be described as "effort revive original MEDO concept", even in modified form, since Nuri made it plain that indigenous initiative was essential feature his plan. Foreign Office concurs in this approach.

Re French participation Nuri told British he had spoken to French here in effort enlist support vis-à-vis Nuri but that he does not favor French association in his proposed regional security arrangements. Foreign Office points out that according Nuri these arrangements would be open to accession by countries "having forces in the region" thereby excluding French. Foreign Office understands Nuri did not go to Paris and that his only discussion with French was with their officials here.

Foreign Office concurs with Department's belief (Deptel 1999) [6] that Northern Tier and ALCSP should be regarded as complementary rather than mutually exclusive. Nuri incidentally told British he was planning approach Turkey, Pakistan and Syria, not Turkey, Pakistan and Iran as indicated Department reference telegram, although he evidently had Iran in mind also. British are awaiting results Nuri's visit Turkey before developing their own views further.

441. In conversation with Prime Minister yesterday he said Nuri Said's visit to Istanbul prolonged several days because conversations difficult and Turks found it hard going move Nuri away from negative thinking. [2] On arrival, Nuri inquired of Menderes what he wanted. Menderes replied to effect Turks would like know how Nuri and his government faced political, economical and social problems of the area as applied to Iraq and what was his solution. To this Nuri returned that Iraqis feared Russians less and hated Israelis more. Their primary preoccupation was to find friends who would help them meet threat of Jewish expansion.

With this in view, Nuri proposed negotiate agreement with Pakistan rather than Turkey, also similar arrangements with Syria. He said that Turks had less preoccupation with problem of Israel than Arab states because territories not contiguous to Israel, and that Pakistan in his opinion would be more willing identify itself with Arab concept Middle East defense, which includes primarily containment of Jews. Menderes felt only way approach this situation constructively was for Nuri present written procès verbal setting forth Iraq estimate of Middle East problem and ideas for a solution, while Turks on their part prepared procès verbal setting forth Turk attitudes and thinking. When this had been done (Prime Minister said Nuri's paper was very short) they then proceeded in frankest manner to narrow field of disagreement and initial points on which there was common understanding. Result of week's conversation was undertaking on part of Nuri Said to accept Turco-Iraqis agreement along lines of Turco-Pakistani pact. Nuri expressed willingness sign immediately but Menderes felt agreement should not be signed until he returns Nuri a visit at Baghdad next January.

Prime Ministers agreed Iraqis should approach Pakistanis also for bilateral agreement and that Turks should approach Syrians. Turks also during course of exchange of visits between Turk and Egyptian Prime Ministers in next few weeks will attempt obtain Egyptian support of program. Menderes explained to me that phasing of steps to be taken will be: 1. His forthcoming visit to Prime Minister of Egypt in Cairo third week in November; 2. Nasir's return visit to Turkey in December; 3. Menderes visit to Nuri at Baghdad in January; and 4. If moment favorable, Menderes visit to Syria following visit to Iraq. Iraqis undertake to sound out Shah re eventual participation Iran but do not believe precipitate action advisable and preferable await reorganization of Iranian armed forces. Menderes believes this series of steps undertaken over period of next six months will establish pattern of Middle East defense in manner particularly satisfactory to US and UK and will bring problem of Israeli-Arab relations into better perspective with hope of establishing modus vivendi on basis Israeli agreement forego unlimited immigration, internationalization of Jerusalem and establishment of boundaries with Arab neighbors along ceasefire lines. In return Arab States will negotiate peace and abandon boycott. Prime Minister added he is informing British Ambassador of his conversations with Nuri in practically same detail given me in order allay any possible British suspicions. He feels complete honesty and frankness on his part with British is essential. He requests Department give him indication its thinking concerning substance foregoing conversations before he leaves for Egypt next month.[3]

Replies to circular telegram 211, October 27, requesting comments on telegram 441 from Ankara, are in Department of State file 780.5. There seems to be no direct response from Ankara, the Embassy rather concentrating on forwarding information supplementary to telegram 441. Ankara offered no explanation as to Menderes' action in not signing at that time.

Replies from Damascus and Beirut, especially Damascus, emphasized that Nuri Said was probably less interested in regional defense than in union between Iraq and Syria under the Hashemite royal house. Israel already disliked the northern tier concept and viewed with great apprehension the Menderes plan for expansion of the regional defense grouping to include Arab states. The British Foreign Office perceived no essential incompatibility between a regional grouping based on the northern tier concept and one based on the Arab League Collective Security Pact. Iranian attitude toward regional security arrangements and problems relating Iranian adherence to Turkey-Pakistan treaty undoubtedly being discussed by departmental officers with Ambassador Henderson. There have been no local developments since Ambassador's departure which would have bearing upon his evaluation of situation.

As Department aware, attitudes in Iran re possible adherence to security pact have improved considerably in recent months particularly following Soviets clumsiness in July 8 aide-mémoire.[4] Certain Iranian newspapers with some regularity refer to futility of neutrality for Iran and necessity for country take its stand with free world; Government apparently attempting cautiously to prepare public for moves in direction adherence to regional security arrangement. Nevertheless, we continue believe Iranian decision this connection not likely to be made before US is prepared discuss with Shah extent to which aid will be given in strengthening Iranian forces. Until then, therefore, we do not believe it would be particularly fruitful for either Turks or Iraqi make definite proposals to Iran re bilateral treaty. Moreover, we inclined believe once Iran is in position to make decision it would be far more reluctant to undertake bilateral pact with Iraq, also relatively weak contributor to area defense, then it would to adhere to existing Turkey–Pakistan treaty with knowledge this measure would have strong US support.

Also we entertain doubts re certain elements Arab-Israel solution mentioned by Menderes and wish to consider whole matter further.

3. We continue support fully northern tier concept as offering best prospect creating area strength but see nothing against step by step approach to Iraqi adherence to Turkey-Pakistan Pact through for example bilateral agreements between Iraq, Turkey and Pakistan. We would be pleased to see Iraq sign bilateral agreement with Turkey during Menderes' forthcoming visit to Iraq.

4. We question practicality endeavoring at this time bring Syria into defense picture. Also because limited appropriations we not able plan this time allot any funds to Syria for military assistance.

Suez Base Agreement [5] provisions for reactivation in case of attack on Turkey provide peg for move in desired direction.

TOP SECRET LONDON, November 16, 1954—6 p.m.

2364. From lengthy discussion at Foreign Office of Iranian defense problem (Deptel 2657) [2] following clarification British attitude emerges:

1. British expects Shah on his forthcoming visit to US and UK to raise problem of association of Iran in regional defense planning in Middle East and for their part will reply that they hope eventually Iran will join some regional defense pact or organization.
2. HMG believes it clearly in UK interest (and also US interest) to secure any improvement in Iranian armed forces that may be possible but until Iran's financial position improves substantially, UK believes US and UK should continue advising Iranians develop their armed forces on modest lines, from economic and practical point of view (paragraph 1 Embassy telegram 2200). [3]
3. At same time British recognize (a) prestige value which Shah, and Iranians generally, attach to military equipment and (b) need for an efficient and contented army, from regime's standpoint.
4. Therefore, problem in British opinion resolves itself into presenting advice to Shah in as palatable form as possible and keeping Shah and army happy about such progress as they are making.
5. While convinced economic progress in Iran should precede any substantial expansion of Iranian armed forces British do not believe economic progress should necessarily precede a diplomatic move such as adherence to a regional defense pact if Iran should decide to do so.
6. In HMG opinion, however, a diplomatic move this sort should not be such as (a) provoke Soviet action under Iranian-Soviet treaty of 1921, or (b) public opinion in Iran or (c) raise any hopes UK will commit any British forces to Iran which Foreign Office stresses HMG will not do. Foreign Office realizes presentation of foregoing to Shah will be difficult process and Shah will ask many searching questions. Foreign Office also very conscious of dilemma posed by problem of neither discouraging nor encouraging Shah too much. When Shah asks specifically what role Iranian armed forces are to play in regional defense British will indicate this primarily military problem which will be taken under consideration (here British have in mind US–UK military talks mentioned paragraph 2 Deptel 2657).[4] Foreign Office, however, is strongly of opinion in advance of such military talks and of Shah's visit, US and UK chief of staff should confer in order coordinate US–UK replies to Shah. British joint chiefs have recently communicated with US chiefs in this regard.

Re last sentence Deptel 2657 Foreign Office confirms HMG not contemplating any definite decisions during course of discussions with Shah in London.

Foreign Office fully concurs in Department's view that US and UK should lend some encouragement to, but not bring pressure on Shah (last two sentences paragraph 1 Deptel 2657). British also share views expressed Tehran's 1016 November 4 [3],[5] to Department which we have discussed with Foreign Office.

It is evident to Embassy after full discussion of foregoing problem with Foreign Office that British realize they may not be able satisfy Shah; that they realize advice they plan give Shah under (1) above may run counter to caveat under (6), particularly in view Soviet-Iranian Treaty; and that consequently they feel they will not be in position make very effective reply when he asks, as he may well, why Iran should run obvious risk inherent in joining "northern tier" regional security arrangement, especially when an arrangement such as present Turkish-Pakistan pact is of purely consultative character.

381. I saw Prime Minister Nuri this morning at my request. I asked him whether the time of the visit of Prime Minister Menderes had now been definitely fixed; what the prospects were of signing a defense agreement during the visit; and what the present attitude was of Egypt on Iraq's proceeding independently at this time with some form of defense agreement, bilateral or regional.

Nuri replied that Menderes had said that he would be in Baghdad on January 6. He was not prepared to sign any kind of defense agreement during the Menderes visit. He needed clarification on certain points before he could sign any agreement. He hoped to get clarification before February. Some time in the course of February when the legislative calendar will have been pretty well cleared, he wanted to make statement in Parliament on regional defense. Egypt, he said, had made her present position clear when she looked with disfavor on Iraq going ahead at this time independently on any defense arrangement.

In elaborating his statement on needed clarification, Nuri said that what he ultimately would like to have was a regional security pact based on Articles 51 and 52 of the UN Charter. But before he could make a move toward any kind of regional pact he would have to know how far the US and UK were prepared to go beyond their NATO commitments. These commitments, he observed, did cover Turkey.

At this point I reminded Nuri of our interest in seeing the northern frontier concept of defense come into being either through a step by step program, or through a single collective act. What we were concerned about was the vacuum now existing on the northern frontier between Turkey and Pakistan. If some initiative were taken by Iraq, I was sure the broader clarification he spoke of would follow in due course. It was hard for him, Nuri then went on to say, in view of Egypt's stand for example, to sign an agreement with Turkey now unless joined by the US and UK. Until the internal situation in Egypt, and for that matter in Syria too, became more stable, it was difficult for him to deal with those countries. In Iran too, a more settled situation had first to evolve. Obviously Nuri, probably in the face of Egyptian pressure, is stalling in the hope of getting some more definite commitment from US and Britain. We had to break off our inconclusive talk as Nuri was due in Parliament and had already run thirty minutes beyond the time he was to appear there.

We agreed to have another talk on the question of defense immediately after the Menderes visit. Nuri said he would then go over in detail with me his exchanges with Menderes.

I would appreciate receiving from the Department before the close of those talks any observations the Department may feel might well be made by me on that occasion. [2]

Unless you perceive objection you should take earliest opportunity explain US position to Nasir. Department suggests you tell Nasir that during discussions in recent months on Middle East Defense problems we have become aware of some misapprehension as to what our position is. An erroneous view seems to have gained currency in some quarters that US favors idea Arabs should collectively and exclusive of non-Arabs, take initiative for regional defense. 886D.2553/1-2352: Despatch

The Consul at Kuwait (Duncan) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL KUWAIT, January 23, 1952.
No. 40

Ref: Kuwait Tels No. 8, November 26, 1951, [2] No. 12, December 28, 1951; [3] Kuwait Despatch No. 39, January 2, 1952. [4]

Subject: Finalization of Formal Agreement for Increased Payments to Ruler of Kuwait for Kuwait Oil Production.

As was reported in Kuwait's Despatch No. 32, November 30, 1951, [5] and Telegram No. 8, November 26, 1951, memorandum of agreement for fifty-fifty division of profits of oil production in Kuwait was signed on November 26, 1951. The drafting of a formal agreement, the accomplishment of the series of corporate changes required, and the preparation of a decree imposing an income tax to accomplish the collection of the increased payment were to be worked out in London between representatives of KOC and the Ruler's London representative, Mr. H. A. Kemp. On December 27, Mr. C.A.P. Southwell, Managing Director of KOC and Mr. Kemp made a hurried trip to Kuwait in order to complete the formalities. Mr. Kemp alleged that he had misunderstood from the very beginning the terms of the agreement with regard to date and time of payment of the tax and it was felt necessary to communicate personally with the Ruler immediately in order that final details could be worked out before the end of December.

[1] For additional documentation, see vol. i, Part 2, pp. 1259 ff.

[2] Not printed; it reported the agreement on payments by the Kuwait Oil Company to the ruler of Kuwait had been signed on Nov. 26; and the final agreement was basically the same as the proposal of July 6, 1951, except that foreign taxes would not be deducted before the Kuwait tax was levied. (886D.2553/11-2651)

For the July 6 proposal, see telegram 178 from London, July 10, 1951, in Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, p. 324.

[3] Not printed; it reported the Managing Director of the Kuwait Oil Company and the ruler's representative arrived in Kuwait on Dec. 27 to discuss the alleged misunderstanding of the date from which the Kuwait tax was to be applied. (886D.2553/12-2851)

[4] Not printed; it transmitted an English language text of a decree by the ruler of Kuwait imposing the income tax decree which was to implement the agreement with the Kuwait Oil Company. (886D.112/1-252)

[5] Not printed; it contained further information on the developments reported in telegram 8. (886D.2553/11-3051)

However incomprehensible such a misunderstanding on the part of Mr. Kemp could have been, it was initially believed, on the basis of a garbled cable received at the Political Agency, that the first taxable year was in question. This was reluctantly reported to the Department. The issue rather was one involving time of payment with, necessarily, the company wishing to assure itself of adequate time for preparation of accounts. The Ruler agreed to the interpretation for time of payment as is included in Article 7 of the Kuwait Tax Decree (Kuwait Despatch No. 39, January 2, 1952) and it was possible to proceed with the formalities for applying the tax (Kuwait Tel. No. 12, December 28, 1951).

Possibly the most deeply concerned over the prospect of delay of finalization of the agreement was the manager of the British Bank of Iran and the Middle East. He was primarily concerned with handling the 100,000,000 Rupee payment scheduled as settlement of claims prior to December 1, 1951, and had made commitments and preparations based on the relative certainty that payment would be made by the end of the year.

Mr. C. J. Pelly, the Political Agent, performed a very rush job in connection with the issuance of the income tax decree inasmuch as under the treaty relationship and particularly the assumptions of jurisdiction under the Order in Council, the British Government asserts extra territorial rights covering, for example, the Kuwait Oil Company and, in addition to the company's political agreement, protecting it from the imposition of a tax relatively confined in its application. Over the weekend of the 29th, and through exchange of highest priority cables, authority was obtained from the Secretary of State in the Foreign Office for the Political Resident in Bahrain to promulgate a regulation removing the exemption of the KOC from the jurisdiction of the Ruler of Kuwait in this particular; and the practical effective date of the agreement was thus, as originally scheduled, December 1, 1951.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, January 28, 1952. [1]

Subject: Aramco Conversations in Riyadh.

Participants: Mr. L. M. Snyder, Vice President, Aramco, New York.

Summary:

Mr. Snyder telephoned to say that his office had just received its first telegram on the subject of the progress of negotiations in Riyadh. [2] Status of the negotiation are as follows:

1. No foreign tax credits before payment of Saudi taxes.
2. The lag in tax payments to the SAG shall be reduced from 12 to 8 months.
3. Deductions for repayment of the cost of the Saudi Railway shall amount to no more than $6 million per year.
4. Aramco agrees to give more generous consideration to their relinquishment program. Relinquishment of particular areas, however, is deferred for the time being.
5. The SAG request for a minimum annual payment of $100 million was refused.
6. Board meetings in Saudi Arabia were refused.
7. The request for an equal number of Saudi members on the Board of Directors and equal voting power with American members was refused. The SAG demand in this respect was premised on a 50–50 partnership concept. The SAG reduced its demand to three Directors which Aramco countered with an offer of two, in keeping with the IPC Agreement.

Mr. Snyder informed me that the conversations have removed from Riyadh to Dhahran at Prince Feisal's request since he has gone to Damman to participate in the boundary negotiations beginning there today. [3]

---

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Jan. 29.

[2] Negotiations between the Arabian American Oil Company and the Saudi Arabian Government, regarding the terms of the Aramco oil concession, had been going on since the previous year.

Editorial Note

A conference on boundary problems between Saudi Arabia and the British, speaking for Qatar and Abu Dhabi, began at Damman, Saudi Arabia, on January 28, 1952. Prince Faisal, Minister of Foreign Affairs, headed the Saudi Arabian Delegation. The British Delegation was headed by Sir Rupert Hay, British Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, and included Shaikh Ali ibn Abdullah al-thani of Qatar and Shaikh Shakhbut ibn Sultan of Abu Dhabi. The discussions were confined to the land boundaries between Saudi Arabia and Qatar, and the western land boundaries of Abu Dhabi. The boundaries of Buraimi and Oman were not discussed at the Damman Conference. Despatch 74 from Dhahran, February 20, 1952, transmitted a summary of the early negotiations to the Department of State. (780.022/2-2052) Additional documentation on this topic is in Department of State file 780.022.

No. 245

Editorial Note

On January 25, 1952, a group of officials of the Iraq Petroleum Company arrived in Baghdad, where they met with the Prime Minister on January 26, and later with the Minister of Economics. At those meetings most of the outstanding issues between the company and the Government of Iraq were settled. The one remaining unsettled issue concerned the availability of sterling balances. That issue was to be treated by an exchange of letters outside the text of the agreement and had been submitted to the British Foreign Office, since it was primarily a governmental problem. (Despatch 697 from Baghdad, February 2; 887.2553/2-252)

Telegram 601 from Baghdad, February 3, reported the IPC oil agreement had been signed by the company and the Government of Iraq, and required only Parliamentary ratification and the signature of the Regent. Telegram 614 from Baghdad, February 9, reported the signing of the IPC agreement had been publicly announced on February 7 and had been sent to Parliament on February 9. Despatches 854, March 11, and 1074 and 1075, April 30, contained some additional information on the IPC agreement, and also on the nationalization of the oil refining and distributing functions of the Khanaquin and Rafidain Oil Companies, subsidiaries of AIOC. Agreements between the Government of Iraq and those two companies had been signed on December 25, 1951, and were sent to Parliament and ratified by it at the same time as the IPC agreement.

All five Independence Party members of the Chamber of Deputies resigned on February 11 in protest against the government's handling of the oil agreements, and the 18-member Nation Socialist Party declared itself against the agreements on the same day. Its members abstained from voting, however, and the Chamber of Deputies passed the oil agreements by a vote of 89 to 7 on February 14. The Senate passed them on February 17 by a vote of 17 to 1, and they were signed by the Regent on February 19. (Baghdad telegrams 627, February 13; 635, February 14; 639, February 18; and 653, February 20)

Despatch 769 from Baghdad, February 19, transmitted the text of the IPC agreement, summaries of the ratification debates in the Parliament, and some material issued by the opposition parties. According to the despatch, the overwhelmingly favorable votes in Parliament did not provide a true reflection of local opinion, but instead were the result of the tactics of Prime Minister Nuri Said. The Ambassador gave credit to Nuri Said for his skill as a negotiator and courage in seeing the agreements through the Parliament. On the other hand he regretted that the Prime Minister had not made a greater effort to broaden the base of political support for the agreements, which would have improved the outlook for both the oil companies and his own future. Arguments that the agreements were "railroaded" through the Parliament were considered valid by some reasonable people.

Telegram 49 from Baghdad, July 11, reported that on the previous day the Iraqi Council of Ministers had approved settlement of the outstanding financial issues with the IPC group, in return for payment of 7.5 million pounds sterling. Despatch 60 from Baghdad, July 19, transmitted a copy of a July 13 letter of agreement between IPC and Iraq, implementing the July 10 decision, which stated that in return for the company's payment the government would discontinue the Gold Case against IPC in the courts of London. Documentation on this topic is in Department of State file 887.2553.

Owen said shift scene negots to Dhahran peculiar in sense supposedly made on King's orders at Prince Feisal's request when latter impelled proceed Dhahran for boundary negots, whereas on arrival Aramco group Feisal expressed surprise see them and said he had expected they wld remain Riyadh and finish work in short time. Result is counselors Jamal Husseini and Khalid Gargoni now out picture and Shaikh Abdullah and Najib Salha have field to themselves. [3]

Agenda on basis King's letter plus additional points introduced by SAG now known as "eleven points". Status each is:

(1) Saudi desire SAG tax be computed before foreign tax: Aramco agreed when explanation failed convince Saudis;

(2) Revision tax payments to make current: After King's discussion complicated formula adopted of which immed effect is payment $40 million more this year than according present arrangement;

(3) and (4) Organizational points including Saudi demands (a) Registration as Saudi Corp, (b) Board meetings in SA, (c) transfer headquarters SA, (d) Transfer books SA, (e) Equal SAG representation on board, (f) 50 percent SAG vote on board: Aramco (a) refusal SAG registration and believe SAG will not press, met (b) and (c) by agreeing give board chairman and pres to field and apppoint new director in field, (d) agreed transfer books, (e) offered two directors but Saudis, after demanding equal representation, wld not go below three and matter stalled here with Aramco apparently prepared

[3] Telegram 435 from Jidda, Feb. 17, not printed, reported the Aramco negotiators had come to Jidda and told officers of the Embassy that conversations became very difficult as Najib Salha and Yassin took over, and Prince Faisal abdicated responsibility. In conclusion, however, the negotiators said the general spirit in the discussions was not unduly discouraging, and they had been impressed by the friendly attitude of the King when they made a farewell call at Riyadh. (886A.2553/2-1275) stand to breaking point because of problem in Aramco organization, of effect on other area agreements where two is maximum board representation and also of fact Aramco negotiators said won't yield on point and feel wld be mistake submit now, (f) refused 50 percent SAG control, pointing out SAG although partner in enterprise, not partner in Aramco.

(5) Saudi demand minimum royalty $100 million for four years after cessation production for any reason: Aramco refused request as fantastic but discussion not complete;

(6) Saudi demand for relinquishment without compensation areas in which oil found but not developed within two years: Aramco made strong rebuttal and question deferred for study because of technical aspects;

(7) Saudi demand for relinquishment within 5 years 50 percent of concessionary area: Aramco indicated favored as rapid relinquishment program as cld reasonably be worked out and stated no objection to other responsible companies entering field. Like (6) after discussion reserved for study with Aramco forsees wld take about six months and hopes SAG will agree;

(8) Saudi request reduction railroad repayment to $500 per month: After discussion, during which Aramco pointed out burden which such demands placed on cash position company and effect on stockholders, Saudi request accepted;

(9) Saudi complaint re non-utilization gas: Aramco explained studies made in past and difficulty economic utilization. However, said glad share all info with anyone interested and, if decided exploit, sell gas, pay royalty and share profit fifty-fifty as provided in concession. Saudis agreed.

(10) Tapline: Essential factor here SAG desire early profits as contrasted present 15-year provision for amortization and discussion inevitably led price differential of $1.43 at Qaisuma and $1.93 at Sidon. Saudis first suggested shortening 15-year period to 5 and Aramco agreed, but Saudis reneged and countered with suggestion Aramco take over tapline completely. Aramco said cld not act beyond SA border and suggested charging $10 million annually for tapline transport facility in SA, which wld net Saudis $5 million as 50 percent tax. Saudis said not enough and Shaikh Abdullah suggested formula which wld place total increase in price attributable transport in SA at $20 million of which SAG wld get $10 million in taxes, but Salha objected still not enough and matter remains under discussion;

(11) SAG letter re taxes: Feisal suggested, and Aramco agreed, refer to subcommittee. Main point is SAG claim $2 million minimum royalty for offshore shld not fall under 50–50 arrangement whereas Aramco maintains clearly does so.

Thus, as matters stand, most points disposed of except number board members, minimum guaranteed royalty and price formula for tapline with impasse reached on first and last two still under discussion. In meantime, directors of 4 parent companies, who obviously had done best be both patient and reasonable, are beginning get somewhat fed up, particularly with kicking around they have been getting by Shaikh Abdullah and Salha since removal negots Dhahran and they are apparently digging in toes to point where prepared break off negots without agreement all points on agenda.

Having discussed situation fully and frankly with directors both during and before negots, my feeling is they have exhibited commendable forthrightness and reasonableness in negotiating with Saudis and that compromise agreement on the three main outstanding points probable except for dispute re number members on board which, curiously enough, outside observers wld probably find difficulty in understanding point at issue as between 2 and 3 members. In circumstances, acrimonious breakup of negot in failure agree on this point, however valid Aramco's reasons may be, cld be unfortunate from relations standpoint and I have asked Owen convey thought to directors that, if they feel necessary stick on this point, they shld be very careful to handle in such way as show reasonableness their position.[4]

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

First of all, however, he wished to point out that the mission was very favorably impressed with Ambassador Hare and the work he is doing in Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Harding's report did not add anything to the information already reported to the Department by Embassy Jidda, other than the views of the mission on the attitude of various SAG officials towards Aramco and the U.S. The Aramco representatives spent the first several weeks at Riyadh, and while there were received by the Crown Prince who was very friendly and asked that he be informed if they were not treated properly. The Foreign Minister, Prince Feisal, attended all of the meetings in Riyadh and contributed a great deal to the friendly atmosphere maintained in the discussions as well as the progress made, despite the tendency of the SAG side to reopen in the morning points on which agreement had been reached the preceding day. During the second week, general agreement was reached on most of the points under discussion and the Aramco representatives were ready to leave when they were called to a meeting with Finance Minister Abdullah Suleiman in Dhahran, at which Deputy Foreign Minister Yusuf Yassin presided. He reopened discussion on all points under consideration, including those on which agreement had been reached. The discussions were resumed at Dhahran but were not nearly as satisfactory as at Riyadh and ended with agreement on only 3 of the 11 points at issue. The discussions were concluded with a statement of the points agreed on and those still to be settled when negotiations are resumed within two months by company officials located in Saudi Arabia. Aramco's Egyptian counselor, Saba Habashy Bey, is highly regarded in Arabia and was especially helpful during the discussions.

One of the major points at issue is the price used in valuing the crude oil output for SAG taxation. This question was raised very early in the discussions, the SAG representatives taking the position the country is not receiving its share of the benefits from the existence of Tapline. After much discussion, it was finally agreed if the company can present facts proving that its position on this point is valid, SAG will accept it, unless in the meantime SAG develops conclusive evidence to the contrary. The raising of the crude oil price in the IPC agreement just renegotiated with the Iraq Government to $1.51 per barrel was mentioned by the SAG negotiators as a basis for at least examination if not revision of the crude oil price specified in the Aramco agreement.

The mission had an audience with the King who was very cordial but apparently very tired. Abdullah Tariki served as the interpreter at the audience . . . .

. . . .

At this point, Mr. Jones asked Mr. Harding if he wished to comment upon the Department's impression that his mission left Arabia in a very pessimistic state of mind as to the company's future there.

Mr. Harding replied that the company is not too perturbed over the situation in view of the fact that general agreement had been reached at one point.

. . . .

Mr. Harding also mentioned that their Egyptian problems were of some concern and that he would like to discuss them with the Department in the near future. Mr. Jones replied that we will be very happy to meet with Mr. Harding whenever he is ready and appreciate having had the opportunity of hearing his comments on the discussions in Saudi Arabia.

Memorandum of Conversation, by David Longanecker of the Office of African Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, March 31, 1952.[1]

Subject: Discussion of IPC New Concession Agreeemnt with Iraq and Operating Plans

Participants: NEA—Mr. Jones
NE—Mr. Stabler
NE—Mr. Funkhouser
NE—Mr. Longanecker
PED—Mr. McMaster
Near East Development Company—Mr. Brewster; Mr. Anderson

Mr. Anderson presented the Departmnet with a copy of the final draft of the new IPC Agreement with the Iraq Government. In response to a question by Mr. Funkhouser, Mr. Anderson expressed the opinion that IPC will produce approximately 14,000,000 tons of petroleum this year, representing a rate of 280,000 bp/d, on which the company will pay the government approximately $5.25 a ton under the new agreement, or a total of some $70,000,000. These figures relate to Kirkuk production sent through the pipeline to Mediterranean terminals. Basra production is expected to amount to 2,200,000 tons during the year, 44,000 bp/d, on which the company will pay the Iraq Government approximately $2,000,000.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Apr. 7.

The new pipeline to the Mediterranean is now completed and should be in operation around the end of April at an approximate 100,000 bp/d flow. The flow will be built up to the line's maximum capacity of 280,000 bp/d.

Basra production is to be increased to the annual level of 8,000,000 tons, 160,000 bp/d, in four years. This increase will require the development of greater storage and loading facilities at the Persian Gulf. The IPC is now considering building a pipeline out into the Persian Gulf to enable deep-sea tanker loading. Some thought is being given also to building a pipeline to the Mediterranean from Basra, but this possibility is remote in view of the fact that the company must immediately build up its transmission facilities to the Persian Gulf and its terminal facilities there in order to carry out the production increase to which it is obligated in the new concession contract.

IPC is still faced with the problem of securing the consent of both Gulbenkian and the French to the terms of the new contract.[2]

With respect to the operations in Qatar of the IPC subsidiary, Petroleum Development, Ltd., the company is faced with a demand from the Sheik of Qatar for a 50-50 concession arrangement similar to the Kuwait Oil Company's contract in Kuwait. The IPC considers the Sheik's demand unacceptable in this early stage of production in Qatar. Production is very small both absolutely and in relation to the capital investment and operating cost of Petroleum Development, Ltd. The output in Qatar is only a fraction of the production in those countries where the so-called 50-50 arrangements are in force.

In response to a query concerning Mr. Funkhouser's recent trip in the Middle East, Mr. Funkhouser reported that the mission in which he participated was extremely well treated by the IPC people in Qatar and elsewhere. He reported that the mission was very much impressed with the caliber of the IPC people and their friendly and cooperative attitude.

The nationalistic desires of each of the small countries on the Mediterranean seaboard, i.e., Lebanon, Syria, and Trans-Jordan, for a local refinery were discussed at some length. Messrs. Brewster and Anderson presented the views of the oil industry, viz., that a small refinery in each country with sufficient capacity to meet its basic products requirements is uneconomic. The demand in these small countries for petroleum products is unbalanced, running heavily to kerosene and fuel oils, and refineries operated to supply the total local demand for these items would have substantial surpluses of other products. The oil industry feels that it would be much more economical to supply these small countries from one refinery. They admit, however, that it will be difficult to withstand the pressure for a small refinery in each of these countries, especially in view of the crude oil to which they are entitled under the pipeline contracts. Mr. Anderson pointed out that Trans-Jordan could obtain its total needs of petroleum products in a few days flow through the now idle pipelines from British topping plants in Iraq.

[2] Despatch 164 from London, July 10, reported that IPC had settled matters with the Government of Iraq, but there was still a great deal of work to be done on the agreement among the companies which owned the IPC. The group agreement was extremely complicated, and the point of contention was related to the tax payments to Iraq. (887.2553/7-1052)

Memorandum of Conversation, by David Longanecker of the Office of African Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 10, 1952.[1]

Subject: Discussions between Aramco and Governments of Lebanon and Syria re revision of Tapline transit agreements.

Participants: NE—Mr. Kopper
NE—Mr. Funkhouser
PED—Mr. Eakens
PED—Mr. McMaster
AF—Mr. Longanecker
Messrs. Duce, Britton, Spiegel—Arabian American Oil Company.

The Aramco officials called at the Department to report on the status of the Syrian, Lebanese and Trans-Jordan Governments' requests for revision of certain provisions of the Tapline transit agreements.

Mr. Duce stated that Tapline is satisfied with the existing arrangement under which the Syrian, Lebanese and Trans-Jordan Governments each have the option to buy, at the world market price, 200,000 tons of crude oil annually from the company. The company is agreeable to extending this arrangement to include the obligation to pay these Governments $1 per ton for all or any portion of the 200,000 tons not taken each year. As a matter of fact, the company is willing to agree to furnish at the world market price half of the crude oil—the IPC should be required to furnish the other half—within a ceiling of 500,000 tons a year, required to meet the domestic requirements of each of these three countries, and with respect to the first 200,000 tons to pay each government $1 a ton for all or any portion thereof which it does not elect to purchase. With regard to the latter, the company is of the opinion it probably will be necessary to agree to a payment of from $2 to $3 a ton. With respect to Syria, the company is tying the above proposal to the Government permitting it to purchase its local currency requirements at the free market rate, as explained in the next paragraph.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Apr. 16.

The major issue with Syria is the arrangement which the company accepted at the time the pipeline was under construction, to purchase local currency to cover local cost on the basis that 80 percent would be purchased at the official exchange rate and 20 percent at the free rate. Tapline intended that this arrangement be limited only to the time the pipeline was under construction and now wishes to purchase all of its local currency needs at the free market rate. On the 80-20 percent basis, the company is paying approximately 13 cents per Syrian pound more than on the 100 percent free market rate. This costs the company about $1,500,000 a year (13 cents times the 12 million Syrian pounds it requires annually to meet local costs). The Syrian Government, however, is insisting on retention of the 80-20 percent basis.

As has been reported, the Government of Syria is contemplating the construction of a refinery at Homs. Tapline would be agreeable to furnish the needs of this refinery from the 500,000 tons of crude oil previously mentioned and within the limitation of 50 percent of the country's crude oil requirements, but would hope to make an exchange agreement with IPC whose pipeline goes by Homs, Tapline delivering a corresponding quantity of Arabian crude to IPC at Sidon. Syria has asked Tapline for assistance in designing and building the refinery but Tapline is agreeable only to suggesting one or more reputable American petroleum engineering firms.

The Lebanese and Syrian Governments are demanding an increase in loading fees which they have agreed to share equally. The company is agreeable to an increase in the loading fee from approximately $0.02 to $0.0329 per ton which is the rate IPC pays.

With reference to Lebanon, the government is requesting that the company now pay municipal taxes. While the company appreciates the fact that the municipalities in which it has substantial office and other space are losing tax revenue, it does not wish to agree to the payment of any taxes, as this would represent modification and lead to eventual elimination of the tax exemption clause in its present transit agreement. The company is willing to make lump sum payments in order to compensate the municipalities partially or wholly for their tax losses.

The Lebanese Government is also requesting permission to use Tapline's port facilities, to which the company is opposed on the basis that the Government is likely to use the facilities for other commodities than oil.

The company is considering lump sum payments to cover various miscellaneous items included in the Lebanese requests, e.g., payments for road maintenance and the use of radio, postal and other facilities. The company is agreeable to the request to maintain the buoys in the harbor.

By and large, Tapline is faced with much the same requests in both Syria and Lebanon but anticipates much less difficulty in reaching a mutually satisfactory agreement with the Lebanese Government. Messrs. Noble and Swiger left yesterday to resume discussions of the unsettled issues with these two Governments.

Mr. Eakens asked whether the lump sum payments to compensate the municipalities for tax losses would be as large or larger than the actual taxes if the company would acquiesce to taxation. Mr. Duce stated that he believed that the lump sum payments would be as large. Mr. Duce repeated that maintaining the tax exemption provision of the present agreement and not the relative size of the lump sum payment is the major consideration. He mentioned the fact that tax exemption in many countries is very important because of the tendency in some countries to levy taxes which, while appearing to be generally applicable, actually apply only to one or more foreign businesses located within the countries. Mr. Eakens questioned, however, whether the tax exemption clause in foreign concession arrangements would not invite local criticism of and opposition to the concessionaire. Mr. Duce recognized this as a vulnerable point but replied that the tax exemption feature is an important inducement to foreign investment capital, especially in countries where the foreign enterprise may be singularly subject to the burden of taxation as previously mentioned. He mentioned that some governments compensate from federal funds, municipalities and states for tax revenue losses resulting from federal arrangements.

The outstanding problems between the company and Jordan are not serious at this time. Talks with the Jordan Government will take place later on.

With respect to the demands of all three countries for their own refineries, Mr. Duce pointed out that the proposed expansion of the Tripoli refinery will more than take care of their petroleum requirements.

Mr. McMaster inquired about the provision in the Tapline agreement with Jordan granting the company the right to build one or more refineries in Jordan. Mr. Duce replied that he did not think the Board of Directors of the company would seriously consider the construction of a refinery in Jordan at this time. Mr. McMaster stated that it is his understanding that the Jordan Government has specifically requested that this portion of the agreement be cancelled or that it be converted into an obligation. Mr. Britton said that he could not possibly justify on economic grounds a refinery in any of these countries. He stated there is sufficient capacity at Tripoli and adequate transportation facilities to service all three countries. He mentioned counting as many as fifty petroleum trucks at a time on the road between Damascus and Beirut enroute to Jordan and, according to his observations, most of the cargo carried was avgas.

Mr. Funkhouser inquired concerning the attitude of the government officials of Syria and Lebanon participating in the discussions with Tapline. Mr. Britton said the officials have proven to be the usual sharp traders, but have been extremely friendly. He believes that it will be possible to negotiate mutually agreeable settlements on all points. The settlements will last until these governments think they can negotiate better arrangements. He mentioned that the company had taken the Lebanese press down to Aramco's operations in Saudi Arabia in order to show them the benefits which have resulted from the company's operations there. The reactions of the Lebanese press to the trip were extremely favorable as were the press articles written after returning to Lebanon. This was a wise public relations job on the part of the company, and it is planned to extend the same courtesy to the Syrian press at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Funkhouser asked whether there is anything more which the U.S. Government can do appropriately to help the company in its negotiations. Mr. Britton replied that he has been away from the Middle East too long to have any immediate opinions on this point.

With repect to the refinery situation, Mr. Duce said that the major problem facing Caltex or any other company in constructing a refinery in the area is the U.S. anti-trust laws which have been extended increasingly during recent years to the overseas operations of U.S. companies. This development is having a depressing influence on the foreign investment activities of U.S. corporations.

880.2553/4-1452

Memorandum by the Chief of the Petroleum Policy Staff (Eakens) to the Director of the Office of International Materials Policy (Brown)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 14, 1952.

Subject: Memorandum of Meetings in Paris, April 7 and 8, 1952.

1. Meeting of April 7 with Mr. B. E. L. Timmons, Deputy Director, MSA Mission to France, on the question of Middle East oil prices. (Present: Timmons, MSA French Mission; Bransky, MSA/E; Dwyer, MSA/W; Sundt, Petroleum Attaché at Embassy Paris; Swihart, RA; and Eakens, PED.)

MSA/E thought it would be useful while Mr. Dwyer, Director of the Petroleum Branch of MSA/W, and I were in Paris to have a meeting on this question with Mr. Labouisse or Mr. Timmons. As Mr. Labouisse was not available, our meeting was with Mr. Timmons.

MSA in Paris did not know very much about this problem and Mr. Dwyer began by describing its present status. The essence of his summary was as follows:

ECA and MSA have been financing purchases of Saudi Arabian crude oil from Caltex, Jersey, and Socony at $1.75 per barrel, whereas the oil is sold to those companies by Aramco for $1.43 per barrel. While the companies contend that Aramco sales are intercompany sales and therefore not subject to the requirement that ECA purchases shall be at the lowest competitive price, some sales nevertheless have been made at a price of $1.44 to Atlantic Refining Company for shipment to the United States. On oil moving through the Trans-Arabian pipe line, the companies charge themselves 26 cents per barrel, whereas the price differential on crude oil at the two ends of the line is 66 cents per barrel—$1.75 at Ras Tanura and $2.41 at Sidon. MSA has discussed the matter with the oil companies. Some of them have generally indicated that they would like to reach a compromise solution. None, however, have come forward with any concrete proposal, and the problem of getting a refund for the overcharges has been turned over to the Department of Justice. Justice has sent a letter to the oil companies asking for a refund. Dwyer did not know the basis or the exact amount of the refund which Justice was asking but assumed that the latter was about $75 million. In addition to the question of the recovery of the overcharge on past shipments, there is also the question of future prices. If the prices are set too low the companies may refuse to ship. If this occurred, the MSA countries would be faced with paying for Middle East oil with free dollars. MSA, without trying to set any price for the future, might simply refuse to finance any more Middle East oil shipments.

The general reaction to this statement of the problem was that it would not have any immediate repercussions on France. France already has all the economic assistance to be made available during this fiscal year. Hence, whatever the outcome of this problem, France will in fact be financing its oil purchases during the remainder of the fiscal year with free dollars. After the end of the fiscal year France probably would find it difficult to finance Middle East oil purchases with free dollars. Even now France is bringing pressure on the oil companies to accept more than 25 per cent in francs for dollar oil in order to spread the available supply of dollars over all essential requirements.

It was decided that MSA in Paris should follow the problem closely but should not take any action with regard to it without a request to do so from Washington.

2. Meeting on April 7 with Mr. Gordon, Manager of Caltex in France. (Present: Gordon, Sundt, and Eakens.)

Mr. Gordon had one major complaint: Caltex's operations are completely hemmed in and repressed in every direction. He said that there had been some improvement in the general atmosphere since Blanchard replaced Guillaumat as Director of the Office of Petroleum. Blanchard, in contrast to Guillaumat, would at least listen to what the company had to say about its problems even if he had not done anything about them. Caltex's principal difficulty is in its inability to expand its refining capacity and its distribution facilities. All refining in France is conducted on the basis of licenses granted for 15 years allowing each company a specified percentage of the total crude oil to be refined. This apparently cannot be changed until 1965 when the current licenses expire.

There was nothing new from the standpoint of Caltex in regard to the question of receiving more than 25 per cent in francs for oil supplied to France. They have not agreed to take any larger percentage in francs and have so informed Blanchard. The next move presumably is up to Blanchard.

3. Meeting on April 8 with officials of Standard Française des Petrole. (Present: Porters, Manager, and Doughten, Sundt, and Eakens.)

The situation in France in so far as Jersey is concerned seems to be generally satisfactory except for the demand that the company take a larger percentage of francs for the dollar oil which it supplies. Jersey, like Caltex, is standing firm on its position that it is not able to utilize more than 25 per cent in francs. The Jersey officials admitted that there were certain things which they might be able to do to use francs on a temporary basis, but that they were not willing to agree to do so as a part of any permanent arrangement. This was the position the company has continually taken in the past and in regard to which its officials in New York have previously informed the Department.

The company has cancelled ten cargoes of crude that were scheduled for delivery to France during the remainder of the current fiscal year, due to the inadequacy of dollars to finance French oil imports. This will not affect the supplies available to France, however, during that period since the company will continue to run its refinery at capacity on crude oil drawn from stocks and in carrying out processing arrangements with other companies. With this reduction in scheduled shipments, Jersey apparently has had sufficient dollars allocated to cover the remaining shipments through the end of the current fiscal year.

With respect to the availability of dollars to cover essential imports, there was the feeling of the SFP officials that the oil industry is being discriminated against in the dollars being made available for oil. Although the inventories are piling up in the textile industry, it was reported that dollars in large amounts are still being made available to cover cotton imports, presumably to prevent unemployment in the French textile industry.

Jersey was interested in what the French financial position in regard to aid will likely be at the end of the fiscal year, but neither Sundt nor I could throw any light on this question.

Although the officials with whom we talked were aware of the Middle East crude price problem, they did not mention it in the discussion.

4. Meeting on April 8 with Mr. Blanchard, Director of the Office of Petroleum. (Present: Blanchard, Sundt, and Eakens.)

Blanchard has recently replaced Guillaumat as Director of the Office of Petroleum in the French Government. Guillaumat, a French Army Colonel, left to become the government member of the Atomic Energy Commission, and Blanchard, who was Guillaumat's assistant, was elevated to the position of Director.

Blanchard expressed a number of strong views, which he apparently firmly holds, on a number of questions. He does not like Jersey. He said that Jersey is the one large company that has not invested any dollars in France since the war. He also said that Jersey is the company that is preventing the other American companies from increasing the percentage of francs which they are willing to take for dollar oil. In response to a question as to what Jersey could do with additional francs since the company's operations already generate more francs than required for its operations, Blanchard said that the company could invest them in other industries. The only one he specifically mentioned was rubber. He had the same comment in regard to Jersey not having brought additional dollars into France. The company, which already had a large operation in France and more francs than it needed in its operations, has in fact been the only company which has not imported new dollars into France.

Blanchard contrasted Socony with Jersey. He mentioned in rather laudatory terms that Socony since the war has imported its own dollars to build two large modern oil refineries.

As for Caltex, he could not understand the company's attitude. It wanted to expand its market position in France, yet two years ago when new 15-year refining licenses were being granted, Caltex refused to go in with a French group which would have welcomed a partnership with Caltex. He said that since Caltex had refused to participate with this French group they were stuck with their present percentage of refining until the existing refining licenses expire in 1965. The company had its last chance and passed it up.

In connection with Caltex's operations, Sundt made the point that Caltex was continually receiving offers from small French companies to sell their distribution facilities. Blanchard said that this was one phase of oil operations in which he did not need American capital and know-how. He said that local French filling stations might be poor and dirty compared with those in the United States but they were adequate for France. He said, however, that he does need American know-how and capital in oil refining and transportation and that he was willing to have American companies participate in those phases of the industry.

Blanchard, who was to have been the French representative on the NATO Petroleum Planning Committee, was not present at the London meeting on April 2. He explained that his absence was due to the fact that he was in Morocco.

He profusely expressed his appreciation for the help which the United States had given him in making supplies of furfural available last fall. These furfural supplies enabled Compagnie Française de Raffinage to begin lubricating oil operations in some new lubricating oil facilities somewhat ahead of schedule and at a time when furfural was practically unobtainable. As regards future supplies, he mentioned that a small plant is under construction in Southern France and that another one is either already in operation or is being built in Morocco.

My general impression of Blanchard was that while very friendly, he has a number of strong ideas about the proper role of foreign oil capital in France, ideas somewhat contrary to those we generally espouse, and that the American oil companies are going to have their troubles operating under his regime.

880.2553/4-1852

Memorandum of Conversation by William McMaster of the Petroleum Policy Staff

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 18, 1952.

Subject: Anglo-American Oil Policy for the Middle East.

Participants: British Embassy
Mr. J. A. Beckett, Petroleum Attaché
Mr. D.A. Greenhill, First Secretary
State
PED—Messrs. Eakens, McMaster
NE—Messrs. Sturgill, Funkhouser, Longanecker

This was the first of a series of meetings expected to be held with the British as requested in their "personal memorandum" entitled "Anglo-American Oil Policy for the Middle East", dated March 24, 1952 and submitted to the Department on March 28, 1952.[1]

1. Discussion of memorandum with British Foreign Office and British Ministry of Fuel and Power:

Mr. Eakens stated that he had discussed the memorandum with representatives of the Foreign Office and the Ministry of Fuel and Power in London in the early part of April. The discussions were primarily on the urgency of an Anglo-American agreement on an oil policy for the Middle East to satisfy the oil producing countries that they are fairly treated and on equal basis with their neighbors. (see 1(c) of British memo.)

There was general recognition of the possible affect of the current Aramco-SAG negotiations on existing agreements in other Middle East countries.

It was agreed that it would be useful to continue discussions of a joint Middle East oil policy in Washington.

Regarding publication of a joint U.S.-U.K. Middle East oil policy it was stated that the U.S. would not favor publication but Mr. Eakens said he had the impression from his discussions in London that the British continue to favor publication.

In addition, the British were informed of the action recently taken by MSA-Justice against American oil companies regarding their pricing practices in connection with shipments of Arabian crude oil to Western Europe under ECA/MSA financing.

2. Development of U.S. position in respect to objectives presented in British memorandum:

[1] Not found in Department of State files.

The British stated that they did not require any positions in writing at the present time but would like to orally discuss the Department's Middle East oil policies as they are developed. However, it was decided that a Department position should be developed on each of the points raised in the British memorandum to be submitted to the British as a memorandum or an Aide-Mémoire.

3. Discussion of FTC report on International Petroleum Cartels: The British were informed that publication of the report was delayed by the FTC because of the Iranian problem. The Department thinks there are major reasons which make it difficult for it to delay publication of the report.

Mr. Greenhill stated that it was unfortunate to add to an already embarrassing situation by publication of past acts of the oil companies. The British would much prefer that the report not be published. If publication cannot be avoided they would like to have adequate advance notice to allow them to make the necessary preparations to meet the possible impact of publication.

4. Relinquishment program in Saudi Arabia:

Mr. Greenhill referred to a despatch from Jidda regarding the relinquishment of oil concessions in Saudi Arabia and asked if there were any new developments on the relinquishment program.

Mr. Eakens stated that the program was already in effect and that 33,000 square miles of Aramco's concession would be relinquished every three years. Mr. Funkhouser pointed out the SAG was talking in terms of a much larger relinquishment—as much as one-half of the Aramco concession.

Memorandum of Conversation, by David Longanecker of the Office of African Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 21, 1952.[1]

Subject: Status of Aramco-SAG discussions of concession terms.

Participants: NE—Mr. Jones
NE—Mr. Kopper
NE—Mr. Awalt
NE—Mr. Sturgill
PED—Mr. McMaster

---

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on May 6.

AF—Mr. Longanecker
Arabian-American Oil Company:
Mr. Duce
Mr. Chapman

Messrs. Duce and Chapman called to inform the Department on the status of the discussions between Aramco and SAG on the latter's request for revision of various terms of the existing concession. Mr. Duce reported that the major SAG proposals together with Aramco's position thereon and the status of discussions are as follow:

(1) Taxes to SAG to be computed on the basis in income before payment of foreign taxes. Aramco has accepted this proposal.

(2) Revision of existing tax payment time schedule to correspond more nearly to SAG financial needs.

Aramco has agreed to a time schedule of tax payments which will provide SAG with a steady flow of income on a monthly basis and place the company's payments on a more current basis. Beginning in September 1952, the company will pay SAG $10,000,000 a month for four months against 1952 earnings. The balance of 1952 taxes will be paid in eight monthly installments. By August 1953 these payments will have amounted to the total 1952 taxes due SAG. In August of each year thereafter, Aramco will estimate the current year's earnings and will pay the tax thereon on the basis of twelve equal monthly installments. In January of each year Aramco will file a preliminary tax return covering the preceding year's earnings, deduct payments made between August and December, and pay the outstanding balance due in eight monthly installments. In September of each year, the company will file a firm declaration of earnings in the preceding year and make any additional tax payments owing to SAG. Approximately 25 percent of the taxes will continue to be paid SAG in sterling.

(3) Equal SAG representation on the Aramco Board of Directors.

SAG originally proposed equal representation on the Board of Directors of the company but changed its proposal to three directorships having a 50 percent vote. The company has refused equal SAG representation either in membership or on a voting basis. In lieu thereof Aramco has proposed giving SAG two directorships. In view of SAG representation on the board, the company proposes to transfer a number of functions from the board to the stockholders, including approval of budgets, salaries, dividends, and modification of concession arrangements.

Mr. Jones inquired whether the company's proposal to transfer functions from the Board of Directors to the stockholders is designed to vitiate SAG's eventual participation on the board. Mr.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Duce answered, "not necessarily", adding that IPC stockholders have had a great deal more control over IPC than Aramco stockholders have had over Aramco. Aramco believes it is desirable to carry out the proposed transfer of functions and will inform the Department of the changes it will be necessary to make in the Aramco by-laws to effect the transfer.

(4) Registration of Aramco as a Saudi Arabian corporation, and transfer of Aramco's headquarters, transfer of the meetings of the Board of Directors and of Aramco accounting to Saudi Arabia.

The company does not intend to agree either to changing the registration of Aramco or to holding the meetings of the Board of Directors in Saudi Arabia. It is agreeable to keeping the books and to moving the company's headquarters to Saudi Arabia. It is willing to transfer the Chairman of the Board and two directors to Saudi Arabia. The transfer of possibly as many as three or four hundred employees from the U.S. to Saudi Arabia will probably be involved in the new arrangement. In response to Mr. Jones' inquiry, Mr. Duce replied that he does not think the new arrangements will mean an increase in the total number of employees of the company.

(5) Payment of a minimum royalty—understood to be $100,000,000 per year for four years.

Aramco does not intend to accede to this request as such a guarantee should not be undertaken by a commercial private enterprise and is actually meaningless. In the earlier discussions Aramco pointed out to SAG that the company has always endeavored to cooperate on all occasions when the government has been in financial difficulty. Recently, for example, the company converted to dollars the unused portion of the sterling it paid SAG on royalty account in 1951.

(6) All proven oil bearing structures or fields must be brought into production within two years. Failure to do so will obligate Aramco to pay SAG the amount of revenue to which SAG would be entitled if the fields were in production.

Aramco has opposed this request but may be forced to accede to it. In this event, the company would start to develop the new fields but would link them to existing fields in order to average out production over all of the structures consistent with the total marketing possibilities.

(7) Obligation to relinquish one-half of the entire concession at the end of five years, and one-half of its proven fields by the end of the next five years.

The company considers unreasonable the SAG request that at the end of five years, half of the total concession area be relinquished. The existing agreement provides for relinquishment of 33,000 square miles beginning in July 1949, every three years until 1955, after which the relinquishments will take place every five years until 1970. The company is preparing to turn back to SAG the second block of acreage under this arrangement in July of this year. Aramco would be glad to include in these relinquishments the controversial boundary areas, after the company is reasonably satisfied they contain no important oil prospects, but feels certain that SAG would regard such action on its part as prejudicial to SAG's claim to these areas. While the company may be forced to accept acceleration of the existing relinquishment rate to the extent of turning back half of the total concession area at the end of five years, it does not intend to agree to release any proven acreage. In response to a question by Mr. Awalt, Mr. Duce stated that the islands off the coast below Qatar are inhabited by people belonging to a tribe which owes allegiance to SAG. In this connection, there are a number of promising oil structures under these islands as well as in near by underwater areas. In addition, there is one promising salt dome structure located in a small peninsula on this coast.

(8) Right to take and dispose of all natural gas not used by Aramco.

The company has not taken a final stand on this proposal but will discuss the matter further with SAG. SAG is interested in the availability of natural gas for establishing a fertilizer plant. Mr. Duce estimates a fertilizer plant could be established at a cost of approximately $30,000,000. A three-way deal might be worked out, involving U.S., Arabian and Pakistani interests, for the production of sulphate of ammonia. Eventually a more complete fertilizer could be produced by the addition of phosphates, important deposits of which are reported to exist and could be developed in Lebanon if the proposed new rail link is completed in Saudi Arabia.

(9) Reduce to $500,000 per month the sum withheld by the company in payment for the railroad.

The company has accepted this proposal, which means that amortization of the railroad debt will extend over seven years instead of three years.

(10) Offshore areas are subject to the same concession terms applicable to the mainland.

Aramco does not accept SAG's position and intends to discuss the matter further. The company particularly objects to the application to the offshore areas of the 50/50 profit sharing and tax arrangements until these areas are brought into actual production.

(11) Transfer of Tapline facilities in Saudi Arabia to Aramco.

The company has proposed a SAG tax on that portion of Tapline in Saudi Arabia and has authorized the Aramco officers negotiating these points with SAG to agree to a Saudi Arabian-Jordan border price of $1.73 per barrel. The price is made up of $1.43 f.o.b. eastern terminus of pipeline, plus 20 cents actual pipeline transit cost to Saudi Arabian-Jordan border, plus 10 cents profit. The higher price basis, $1.73 per barrel, will increase SAG's share of profits only by one-half of the 10 cent profit figure, or by 5 cents a barrel.

The company is undecided on a settlement price for the crude oil shipped by water from Ras Tanura. It is aware of the possible impact on these price negotiations, of the current MSA-Department of Justice action on the price of Arabian crude shipments to Western Europe under ECA/MSA financing. (In response to a request by ECA/MSA, the Justice Department has recently transmitted a claim to the stockholding companies in Aramco for a refund of the overcharge for Arabian crude financed by the ECA/MSA up to date. These claims total from 50 to 75 million dollars.)

The price on which the 50/50 profit sharing arrangement is based is $1.43 a barrel whereas the quoted price at Sidon is $2.41 a barrel. SAG would like to participate in the Sidon price. In this connection, IPC has agreed on a price at the Syria-Iraq border of $1.74 a barrel and it is likely that this aspect of the IPC agreement will strengthen the SAG position. IPC has also agreed on a price of $1.51 at Fao, which is also in contrast to Aramco's $1.43 price basis. Mr. Duce stated that this price question is the most difficult problem between the company and SAG.

. . . .

Resumption of the discussions between the company and SAG were orginally scheduled for April 22 but will be delayed for a week or so. [2]

---

[2] When the Aramco negotiators returned to reopen the discussions on Apr. 25, the Minister of Finance refused to deal with a group headed by Ohliger because he wanted to deal only with the top Aramco people. Arrangements were then made for the chairman of the board and president of Aramco to head the negotiating team and discussions resumed on May 5. Most of the conversations were on oil prices, before an amicable adjournment of the negotiations on May 15 at the request of the Saudi Arabian Government. Further discussions were to be postponed for the duration of Ramadan, from May 25 to June 23, and it was considered possible that they might not begin again until fall. (Telegrams 631 and 633 from Jidda, Apr. 30; 646, May 5; 662, May 14; and 678, May 20) Documentation is in Department of State file 886A.2553. For information on the resumption of negotiations later in the year, see Document 271.

Memorandum of Conversation, by David Longanecker of the Office of African Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, April 25, 1952. [1]

Subject: Discussion of American Independent Oil Company Operations in the Neutral Zone.

Participants: NE—Mr. Jones
NE—Mr. Awalt
NE—Mr. Funkhouser
AF—Mr. Longanecker
Mr. Harley Stevens—American Independent Oil Company

Following a brief summary of observations relating to current political conditions in the Persian Gulf area, Mr. Stevens stated that he had three specific items to discuss with the Department.

The first item concerned the status of the company's drilling operations. Their fifth exploratory well is down to 4500 feet and prospects at this stage are not too promising. The well is being drilled about five miles south of Khor Mufada, in the southeastern corner of the Neutral Zone, about sixteen miles above the Saudi Arabian border and within sight of the Gulf. If this is another dry hole, some of the stockholders in the American Independent Oil Company (hereinafter referred to as Aminco) may be disposed to withdraw from the company. Any stockholders in Aminco who wish to withdraw must give the other stockholders the first option to purchase their stock participation. Mr. Stevens feels that the Phillips Petroleum Corporation, by far the largest stockholder in Aminco, will wish to continue exploration in the Neutral Zone, at least until the completion of exploration wells in each of four remaining promising structures. He feels that one location which should be tested lies due south of the Brughan field in Kuwait, just across the border in the Neutral Zone, which would seem to be located on the natural extension of the Burghan producing basin. Mr. Stevens also feels that Aminco's equal partner, the Pacific Western Oil Company, which holds a concession from SAG for the latter's half interest in the Neutral Zone, will also wish to continue operations in the Neutral Zone even if the fifth exploration well now being drilled turns out to be a dry hole.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on May 7.

After some discussion of the point, it was decided that the proper course of procedure for Mr. Stevens is to approach Colonel Drake of the Gulf Oil Corporation, the American partner in the Kuwait Oil Company, for the desired information. Mr. Stevens felt that this procedure would be successful and, if not, he would communicate again with the Department. It was agreed also that in the latter event the Department might appropriately take the matter up with the British Foreign Office, suggesting that it would appear to be appropriate for the Foreign Office to assist Mr. Stevens in this matter.

With respect to the islands previously mentioned, Mr. Stevens stated that Aminco intended to keep them within its concession as long as possible, but must either give them up or begin drilling on them within three years. Another provision requires the company to pay the Sheik $50,000 at the end of five years. Either of these two obligations, depending upon circumstances existing at the time these periods approach an end, may decide the company to release the islands from the concession.

Mr. Jones asked whether Mr. Stevens has heard any reports or has any opinions on whether the British are thinking or working on a confederation of the Shiekdoms in the Persian Gulf area. Mr. Stevens said he feels that there is something going on along this line but does not have any clear ideas on the subject. There may be some ideas of bringing about a confederation of Iraq and Kuwait which would seem to be one of the more logical combinations. Whether current ideas go beyond this point he does not know. He does feel that the British are very anxious to consolidate their position in this last remaining stronghold of British economic interest.

Memorandum of Conversation, by William McMaster of the Petroleum Policy Staff

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 6, 1952.[1]

Subject: Discussion of Federal Trade Commission Report on International Petroleum Cartels with Representatives of the British Embassy.[2]

Participants: Mr. D. A. Greenhill, First Secretary, British Embassy

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on May 9.

[2] For additional documentation on this FTC report, see vol. I, Part 2, pp. 1259 ff.

Mr. J. A. Beckett, Petroleum Attaché, British Embassy
Mr. R. W. Bailey, British Embassy
Mr. Eakens, Miss Mims, Mr. McMaster—PED

Mr. Greenhill summarized a communication received from the British Foreign Office which indicated that if the FTC report cannot be suppressed the British would favor its publication as soon as possible in order to prevent fragments of the report from leaking to the press and stimulating more interest and doing more harm than outright publication. If the report is to be published they would like to obtain a copy as soon as possible so as to be prepared to meet any possible repercussions. They also believe that it would be desirable for the oil companies involved to have an opportunity to see the report and also to be in a position to rebut the charges made against them.

The British were advised of the nature of the Department's position in respect to publication of the report. What the report will probably say when and if published was discussed in general terms with particular reference to the history of the Iraq Petroleum Corporation, which is likely to be the most damaging section of the report.

The British representatives stated that their main concern at this time was to provide their Government with advice regarding the action it should take to counteract the impact of publication.

In view of the nature of the charges made in the report and the continuing uncertainty that it will be published, Mr. Greenhill stated that he would advise his Government that for the present they should be thinking up explanations of the charges in the event of publication.

The British representatives felt that publication of the report would of course have serious implications in the Middle East area. They are aware that similar charges have been placed against the oil companies in the past by some Middle East Governments but recognize that publication of the FTC report will tend to confirm those charges.

Before leaving the meeting Mr. Greenhill stated that Mr. Howard A. Cowden, Secretary of the International Cooperative Petroleum Association, has requested a meeting with the British on May 12 to discuss ICPA's proposal for a solution of the Iranian oil controversy. Mr. Eakens stated that Mr. Cowden had discussed ICPA's proposal with officers of the Department and that he had been advised that there was no objection to his discussing the proposal with the British but that we had asked him to check back with the Department before he undertook any discussions with Iran.

Mr. Greenhill believed that the British would probably try to discourage ICPA from entering the controversy and wondered to what extent they could go in advising Mr. Cowden of their reasons for discouraging ICPA action. Mr. Eakens said that Mr. Cowden had in the past abided by the advice of the Department in this case and that he believed Mr. Cowden to be completely reliable.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of Arabian Peninsula Affairs (Awalt)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 7, 1952.

Subject: British Inquiry on Current Saudi Arabian Oil Negotiations.

Participants: Mr. Denis Greenhill—British Embassy
NE—Mr. Jones
NE—Mr. Kopper
NE—Mr. Awalt

Summary:

Mr. Greenhill called at his request to say that he had a telegram from the Foreign Office reporting information received in London that in the current SAG-Aramco negotiations the SAG was demanding various additional rights which might upset the oil stability of the Persian Gulf. The Foreign Office wished to ascertain whether there was any truth to the reports. In particular the telegram said that Saudi Arabia was asking for 50 percent membership in the Board of Directors; relinquishment of one-half the Aramco concession area by the end of five years; a penalty on non-production of oil; and Saudi Arabian operation of the oil company in time of war. [1]

Mr. Greenhill was told that there was some substance to some of these points but that we knew of no demand on the part of the SAG that it should operate the oil fields in time of war. Mr. Jones added that there was nothing in the current negotiations which would upset in any way the 50-50 division of profits and if a demand for a greater Saudi Arabian share should develop, we would certainly know about it well in advance. Mr. Greenhill said he hoped that advance information would be available so that other oil interests would not be caught by surprise as they were in December 1950.[2] He added in this respect that that had much to do with their difficulties in Iran. Strong exception was taken to this statement by Mr. Jones, and Mr. Kopper pointed out that Mr. McGhee had warned the Foreign Office over a year before this agreement of the probable trend of events in Iran and Saudi Arabia. Mr. Kopper also pointed out that the 50-50 Aramco arrangement was not a precedent but was the only reasonable arrangement that could be made in the face of the Venezuelan and Indonesian concession arrangements. In so far as the other demands reported by the Foreign Office were concerned, it was suggested that they might well constitute asking points of the SAG and Aramco might be expected to argue them firmly before making compromise settlements, if any.

Mr. Jones suggested to Mr. Greenhill that he should get in touch with Mr. Duce of Aramco for a fuller discussion of the present negotiations and Mr. Greenhill said that he would endeavor to do so.

Editorial Note

Despatch 639 from Beirut, May 28, transmitted to the Department of State copies of the completed agreements negotiated by the Trans-Arabian Pipeline Company (Tapline) with the Governments of Lebanon and Syria. The agreements with Lebanon consisted of three letters, each dated May 17, and signed by the Lebanese Prime Minister Sami Bey Solh and C. A. Swigart, President of Tapline. The first letter covered the disposition of crude oil entitlement and the right to import and export currencies and foreign exchange at the free market rate. The second covered an increase in the loading fee, and the third consisted of a collection of small items. The agreement with Lebanon was to be effective on the date of signature, May 17. The Syrian agreement consisted of one document, signed on May 21 by Swigart and Fawzi Selo, the Chief of State and President of the Council of Ministers. It was similar to the Lebanese agreement but was to come into force upon ratification by the Syrian Government.

Despatch 653 from Beirut, June 3, transmitted a copy of the Iraq Petroleum Company Heads of Agreement, with Appendices, negotiated between the company and the Lebanese Government. It had been signed on May 15 by Sami Solh and S. Belgrave, for the IPC. The agreement was to be submitted to the Parliament for ratification within the next few weeks but, since it had been approved by the President and Prime Minister, little opposition was expected. Documentation on this topic is in Department of State file 883A.2553.

Memorandum by David Longanecker of the Office of African Affairs to the Deputy Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Kopper)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 6, 1952.

Subject: Conferences with major oil companies in New York on June 2–4.

In accordance with your suggestion, I accompanied Mr. Moline and Mr. Ortiz to New York for the conferences they arranged for June 2–4 with officials of the major oil companies concerned with foreign production, refining and marketing operations, particularly in the Middle East. These conferences were arranged to give the appropriate officials of the companies an opportunity to meet and discuss their problems, current and anticipated, with Messrs. Moline and Ortiz before their departure this month for their assignments as Petroleum Attachés to London and the Middle East, respectively.

We met with officials representing the (1) Asiatic Petroleum Company on Monday morning; (2) Socony Vacuum Oil Company on Monday afternoon; (3) Standard Oil Company of New Jersey on Tuesday morning; (4) Aramco followed by Standard Oil Company of California Tuesday afternoon; (5) California–Texas Oil Company on Wednesday morning; and (6) Gulf Oil Corporation Wednesday afternoon. The discussions were very cordial, and the principal points may be summarized as follows:

(1) The companies all feel they will be faced with continuing governmental demands for larger payments for producing concessions and transit rights in the Middle East. All share the opinion in varying degrees that some means should be developed to stabilize their position on bases which are equitable to both the governments and the companies. Aramco, however, appears to feel that for the time being the companies must struggle along on their own with the customary degree of informal assistance from the Department. At the same time, there is a general feeling that the U.S. and UK Governments should be working on developing a solution to the problem in view of the security interest involved. The companies do not have any clear ideas of how their position might be stabilized, but are giving the problem serious thought in the expectation that it will continue to grow worse and requires solution sooner or later.

Inquiry revealed that all of the companies are increasingly conscious of the need for greater attention to public relations, including company activities such as vocational-academic training-on-the-job, medical services, social facilities, etc. Cal-Tex reported they have led the way in on-the-job-training in their Bahrein production and refining operations which have been followed by Aramco in Saudi Arabia and Gulf Oil in Kuwait. Other contributions by the companies include foreign scholarships for eligible local people; funds for public buildings, hospitals, schools; the drilling of water wells for local use throughout the areas in which they operate, but the more the companies give, the greater are the demands (a nouveau riche behavior pattern on the part of the governments). The situation grows increasingly unpalatable to the companies operating in those countries where the Rulers have relatively tremendous incomes of which very little is used for improving the health, productivity and welfare of their people.

(2) One company commented on the withdrawal of the Superior Oil Company from Qatar, to the effect that (a) Superior's relinquishment of its offshore concession had not had any noticeable salutary effect on the attitude of the other governments toward the oil companies operating in their territory, and (b) Superior did not give up its concession because of lack of confidence in its future relations with the Shiekhdom but because of financial developments in the company's U.S. operations.

The industry also doubts that Iran's predicament resulting from the extreme action taken by the Government against AIOC has had any moderating influence on the other governments in the area. The consensus appears to be that the other governments are fully conscious of the adverse effects of the Iranian Government's extreme action, have little sympathy for that Government, but consistent with the behavior pattern of the "nouveau riche" will continue for some time to face the companies with ever-increasng demands short of nationalization.

(3) The companies are in general agreement that the annual rate of increase in world oil demand will gradually drop to a 6–8 percent annual rate of growth. Crude oil supplies will be adequate but the margin over demand will remain close if Iranian production is not resumed.

(4) The relationship between refinery capacity and products demand will also remain very close despite the new refineries under construction or planned. Here again, resumption of crude production in Iran and reopening of the Abadan Refinery would provide a more comfortable margin between products output and demand.

(5) The transportation situation, despite the substantial tanker building program, will also remain in close balance. Tanker rates are expected to remain above the USMC rate, and may be again very high during the coming winter as the tanker market is very sensitive to even slight variations between tanker supply and demand.

(6) The companies generally realize they may again face a dollar-sterling oil problem, the substitution of "sterling" for "dollar" oil in markets long on sterling and short of dollar exchange. The first impact of substitution would be on Western Hemisphere dollar oil shipments to Eastern Hemisphere markets, the second would be on Arabian oil for Eastern Hemisphere markets. Cal-Tex is not too pessimistic over the outlook, feeling that the British Treasury will be sufficiently flexible with respect to the arrangements made several years ago under which the company is permitted (a) to sell dollar oil for sterling in sterling areas as well as in some third countries, and (b) to obtain dollars from the British Treasury for reasonable profit remittances and dollar cost elements in the oil sold. Standard of New Jersey and Socony-Vacuum would be most affected by reappearance of the dollar-sterling oil problem. Gulf Oil is not involved in this marketing problem, as most of its 50 percent share of Kuwait production is taken by Shell under a long-term contract and the remainder shipped to refineries in the U.S.

Mr. Moline pointed this problem up by mentioning that Japan has a burdensome accumulation of sterling and a shortage of dollars, and oil appears to be the major item which the Japanese might acquire with sterling. While the American companies appreciate the possibility of currency developments favoring greater purchases of sterling oil, they find some comfort in the belief that the British companies cannot produce, in the continued absence of Iranian supplies, any appreciable quantity of oil beyond their normal share of the world market.

(7) Aramco expressed some concern over the possibility that with the federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia, the Ethiopian Government would, in favoring the Government-owned Ethiopian Airline, interfere with the company's present arrangements under which it flies its own planes and when necessary charters Air Djibouti planes to transport personnel and foodstuffs from Eritrea to Dhahran. Mr. Duce was informed that the Department is now looking into this matter, as we are interested in both the company's needs for labor and foodstuffs from Eritrea and the important economic contributions these activities make to the Eritrean economy.

(8) In the meetings with Standard of New Jersey and Aramco, Mr. Moline asked whether the companies had any views on the possibility of the development eventually of a separate price structure for Middle East oil based on its natural Eastern Hemisphere market, i.e., independent of the Gulf Coast price basis.

On this point, the company representatives expressed the possibility that as the Eastern Hemisphere petroleum market is supplied increasingly from Middle East and other non-Western Hemisphere sources, a price structure independent of the U.S. Gulf Coast may develop. The matter was considered interesting and deserving of consideration, as fuel oil, by far the major product quantity-wise from Middle East crude, is priced too low, in the opinion of the companies, in relation to both the price of crude oil and of coal with which it competes in the European and other Eastern Hemisphere fuel markets. At least a theoretical case can be made for this viewpoint, as the price structure for Middle East crude and products is based on the U.S. Gulf Coast price pattern which in turn is based on the dominant position of the higher-priced lighter products (particularly gasoline) in both (1) the product yield pattern of Western Hemisphere crude and (2) the product demand pattern in the Western Hemisphere market. The petroleum industry developed primarily on the basis of demand of gasoline and kerosene (and lube oils), with the heavier products considered as residuals to be minimized in refinery yields and priced accordingly. In general outline, this price pattern still holds and does not fit either the product yield pattern of Middle East crude in which fuel oil (which is priced at less than the crude oil from which it is derived) predominates, or the demand pattern of the Eastern Hemisphere market in which the lower-priced products, kerosene, distillates, and fuel oil predominate.

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of International Materials Policy (Evans) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Linder) [1]

RESTRICTED WASHINGTON, June 12, 1952.

Subject: Future MSA Financing of Crude Oil

Mr. W. John Kenney, Deputy Director of MSA, has advised the Department that MSA intends to take action this week with respect to future financing of crude oil shipments to participating countries. MSA is considering the following two possible courses of action:

(1) Notify the oil companies involved that shipments of Middle East crude oil priced in excess of a specified price per barrel (maximum price to be specified by MSA, probably $1.43 per barrel f.o.b. Persian Gulf ports) are not eligible for MSA financing.

(2) Remove crude oil from the list of commodities eligible for MSA financing.

The need for MSA action along the lines indicated is the result of the Middle East crude oil price controversy between MSA and the American oil companies which export Middle East crude oil to participating countries at $1.75 per barrel f.o.b. Persian Gulf ports and at the same time export the same crude to Western Hemisphere customers at $1.43 per barrel. MSA contends that the price charged on shipments to the Western Hemisphere is the maximum price eligible for MSA financing of Middle East crude oil under MSA Regulation 1. A claim for reimbursement of the overcharge on past shipments has been turned over to the Department of Justice. MSA is now concerned with the course of action to be followed in the future in respect to the price of Middle East crude.

The possible courses of action indicated have been discussed with BNA, WE, CA and OFD who all agree that this is a decision for MSA to make after they have carefully considered the impact of their action on the participating countries.

There is a strong tendency, however, to favor the first course of action for the following reasons:

(a) The participating countries rely on Western Hemisphere sources for special types of crude which should continue to be financed by MSA;

(b) A reduction in Middle East crude prices is more likely to be achieved if MSA financing continues to be available in the event the companies, or any one of the companies, elect to ship at a price eligible for MSA financing. If MSA financing is not available, as would be the case under the second course of action, the burden of obtaining a price reduction would be entirely on the participating countries; and

---

[1] This memorandum was drafted by McMaster.

(c) Removal of crude oil from the list of commodities eligible for MSA financing would immediately raise questions as to the logic of continuing to finance refined petroleum products. The first course of action would avoid raising this issue unnecessarily.

The only real argument in favor of the second course of action is that the participating countries will eventually have to face up to the problem of providing the dollars necessary to meet their dollar crude oil requirements, so there is no real reason for delaying that eventuality.

We have also considered the possibility that a refusal on the part of the oil companies to sell Middle East oil to the participating countries at a price acceptable to MSA might have the result of diverting purchases to the Western Hemisphere at a higher price and thus result in an unnecessary drain on MSA resources. MSA, however, has assured us that this cannot happen and that they would not finance increased purchases in the Western Hemisphere which might result from any action taken by MSA.

On the basis of these views, it is recommended that the Department advise MSA that the course of action to be followed is a decision for MSA to make, but of the two courses of action being considered the Department would prefer the first.

As long as Mr. Kenney requested the Department's views by telephone, it seems to me that an expression of our views to MSA by telephone would be appropriate. Do you want to call Mr. Kenney, or shall I?

Mr. McMaster—PED

This was the second in a series of meetings with respect to Anglo-American oil policy for the Middle East [2] as requested in a British memorandum submitted to the Department on March 24, 1952. [3] The following subjects were discussed:

1. Department position with respect to each of the points raised in the British memorandum of March 24, 1952. Mr. Greenhill stated that the primary reason for requesting this meeting was to determine the status of the Aide-Mémoire which Department representatives had agreed to prepare for submission to the British, outlining the Department's position with respect to an Anglo-American oil policy for the Middle East. The Department informed the British that the Department's position was being developed and that as soon as it is completed an Aide-Mémoire outlining the Department's position would be submitted to the British Government. Mr. Greenhill said that the Heads of British Overseas Missions are presently meeting in London and he had hoped that the Department's position had progressed to the extent that he would be able to inform this group as to the likely course to be followed regarding an Anglo-American oil policy for the Middle East. Inasmuch as the Mission Heads' meeting is scheduled to adjourn within the next few days, Mr. Greenhill was informed that it was not likely that a Department position would be available for that purpose.

2. Regularizing informal U.S.-U.K. meetings on Middle East oil policy. The British representatives requested the Department's views with respect to establishing a regular meeting date for these informal U.S.-U.K. discussions on Middle East oil policy. It was agreed that these informal meetings would be held once a month, but if developments in the Middle East required, the meetings would be held more frequently. It was therefore agreed that the next meeting of this group would be held on July 14, 1952 at 3:00 P.M. [4]

3. Discussion of FTC Report on the International Petroleum Cartel. Mr. Greenhill asked if any new developments could be reported regarding the status of the FTC Report on the International Petroleum Cartel. The British were advised that the information presented to them in the meeting of May 6, 1952 on that subject remained unchanged and that there had been no new developments.[5]

4. Aramco-Saudi Arabian Government negotiations. Mr. Greenhill stated that he had been informed that the firm of McNaughton-DeGolyer had agreed to act as consultants to the Saudi Arabian Government on several of the issues which have not been settled in the current SAG–Aramco negotiations.

The British were advised that officials of Aramco had met informally with Department officials earlier in the day regarding the status of the SAG negotiations, but as none of this group had attended that meeting we were unable to confirm the British information.

5. Discussion of construction of Syrian oil refinery. The British were advised that the Department and the IBRD are presently studying a Syrian Government request for the construction of a 12,000 to 20,000 barrel per day oil refinery. They were also advised that the subject had been discussed with U.S. oil companies but that the companies had not indicated any interest either in constructing a refinery for their own account or in operating a refinery for the account of the Syrian Government.

Mr. Beckett said that in compliance with a request from the Department he had requested the British Government's views regarding the refinery but had not yet received a reply.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Robert Sturgill of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on June 23.

Summary:

Mr. Duce brought Mr. Ohliger and Mr. Owen, who recently returned to the US from Dhahran for a brief visit, into the Department for an informal meeting with Mr. Hart. Mr. Ohliger said he would remain in the US for about two or three weeks. Mr. Owen said he was returning to Saudi Arabia on June 30.

After briefly referring to the background of the SAG–Aramco negotiations, which are in temporary suspension by mutual agreement, [2] Mr. Ohliger said the SAG had chosen the firm of DeGolyer and McNaughton of Texas to advise the Government on certain aspects of the negotiations. The firm, Mr. Duce said, is known to be extremely competent on oil pricing problems, and Aramco officials are pleased over the selection. He outlined briefly how the Texas firm was chosen: Following suspension of the discussions, Sheikh Abdullah Suleiman had cabled the Saudi Arabian Ambassador in Washington for assistance in choosing three advisors, one Mexican, one Venezuelan, and one Canadian. The Ambassador had spoken to him (Duce) about it and then had discouraged this request, pointing out to the Finance Minister that Mexico had no real oil industry and therefore no advisors, that Venezuelan oil competed directly with Saudi oil, and that if it were a Saudi desire to keep the British out of the country as much as possible, then a Canadian should not be named. The Ambassador recommended DeGolyer and McNaughton. This firm, Mr. Duce added, also is a consultant for the US Navy.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Linder) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington,] July 28, 1952.

Subject: Grand Jury Investigation of the Cartel Activities of the International Oil Companies.

On June 23 the President sent the Secretary the attached memorandum.[2] You will note that the President had requested the Attorney General to institute appropriate legal proceedings with respect to the operations of the international oil cartel, and that he asked the Secretary to cooperate with the Attorney General in gathering the evidence required for the proceedings.

[1] Drafted by Eakens and sent to Byroade, Miller, Perkins, Allison, and Fisher.

[2] The memorandum, dated June 23, not printed, was also sent to the Federal Trade Commission and the Secretaries of Defense, Interior, and Commerce. It informed them that the President had requested the Attorney General to institute the appropriate legal proceedings with respect to the operations of the international oil cartel, and he asked the recipients of the memorandum to cooperate in gathering evidence required for the proceedings.

On July 17 the Attorney General announced that a Federal Grand Jury would shortly begin investigating the activities of the international oil cartel.

Followng receipt of the President's memorandum, Justice was informed that the Department would cooperate with them in the investigation, and that Mr. Eakens of the Petroleum Policy Staff and Mr. Dixon of the Business Practices and Technology Staff had been designated as liaison officers with Justice in this matter. A copy of the letter to Justice is also attached.[3]

In addition to the Grand Jury investigation of the oil companies, there are indications that one or possibly more Congressional committees in the next Congress will investigate the activities of the international oil companies.

I believe it is desirable for each office in the Department to determine what information its files may contain that may be relevant to these inquiries. I believe that it would also be useful if you would designate someone in your office to work with Mr. Eakens and Mr. Dixon on this problem.

Preliminary discussions are taking place with Justice to determine the scope and nature of the charges that will be presented to the Grand Jury. While no time has yet been set for the Grand Jury investigation, action appears to be imminent and it is desirable for the Department to be prepared as soon as possible.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of the Petroleum Policy Staff (Eakens)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 5, 1952.[1]

Subject: Continuation of Discussions with the British Embassy on Anglo-American Oil Problems.

---

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Aug. 13.

Participants: Mr. J. A. Beckett, British Petroleum Attaché
Mr. R. W. Bailey, First Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. Longanecker—NE
Mr. Eakens—PED

This was the first general discussion of Middle East oil problems held with the British since June 20, 1952.

The postponement of the monthly meeting, which it had generally been decided to hold, resulted from the fact that there was some feeling in the Department that American and British company problems in the Middle East could not be very usefully discussed intergovernmentally until the implications of the FTC Report and the grand jury investigation of the international oil companies had become clear. It was decided that there was no objection to holding these discussions provided there was no attempt to reach agreement on such problems, and it was on this basis that this meeting was held.

The meeting was convened at the suggestion of the British who said that they had some matters which they wished to discuss. The one subject which the British representatives discussed at some length was the question of a decentralization of the activities of the oil companies in the Middle East. Mr. Beckett began the discussion by outlining the U.K. views on decentralization. These views are as follows: They feel that the British companies are in a somewhat different position than Aramco in respect to establishing their headquarters in the Middle East. They doubt that it would be advisable or wise for IPC, which is the one British company in operation in the Middle East at the present time, to establish its headquarters in Baghdad. . . .

The British view some decentralization with favor. They think there should be more decentralization than now exists but less than what Aramco has agreed to. Their idea is to establish four main areas in the Middle East and to have an IPC managing director in charge of each who would report directly to London. The four areas would be Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and the Persian Gulf area. This new arrangement would differ from that now existing in that Tripoli as the regional headquarters in the whole Middle East would be eliminated. Discussions brought out that having Middle East operations directed from Tripoli is not a happy arrangement. One thing mentioned in this connection was the fact that it is difficult to bring non-Lebanese employees into the regional headquarters at Tripoli. As a side comment, Mr. Beckett said that this scheme of decentralization is a program that Gibson of IPC is trying to sell but has not yet sold to the partners in IPC.

Mr. Beckett inquired whether it is in fact true that a new oil discovery has been made in Iran about fifty miles south of Tehran. He said that he had noticed in the press that such a discovery has been made and that the initial well would make one thousand barrels per day. Mr. Eakens confirmed that a discovery has been made but the well made gas, oil and water, and it was not certain whether it was a commercial producer. He said that while it was possible that an important discovery had been made, this should be proved by the next well which, on the basis of the information gained from the drilling of the first three wells, should be located more nearly on the structure.

There was brief mention of the amendment in the Egyptian company law which permits major ownership by foreign nationals in Egyptian corporations. Mention was also made of the suspended negotiations between Aramco and SAG. Neither of these topics was discussed on any substantive basis.

Mr. Beckett observed that he had noticed that Turkey seemed to be interested in trying to get foreign companies to come there to engage in oil operations. On questioning, he agreed that Turkey was not a first-class prospect, that it would be a difficult and rugged country for an oil company to operate in, and that there would not be any rush of companies to Turkey.

[2] Not printed; it reported the French Minister had told an Embassy officer Iraq was formulating a proposal to the IPC to build the extension from the Haifa pipeline to the coast of Lebanon. The Iraqi Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs told the French Minister the time had come for IPC to either abandon the idea of using the Haifa pipeline or to divert it through Arab territory. (887.2553/7-2452)

[3] Not printed; it informed the Department of State that the Minister of Economics, on instructions from the Prime Minister, asked the IPC's Baghdad Manager to consider diverting the Haifa pipeline to the Mediterranean coast outside Israel. His argument was that settlement of the Jewish-Arab controversy was unlikely in the near future, and the Haifa pipeline, which was lying idle, could accommodate exports of 7 million tons of crude oil. The Embassy considered the proposal fraught with political implications, especially in view of Israel's inclination to nationalize the Haifa refinery. (887.2553/9-352)

sion "Haifa" pipelines [4] from Mafrag, Jordan to Sidon, Leb. Iraq Min planned approach company but desired Fon Office views before hand.

Brit FonOff preliminary position is that it will not take sides in controversy, will not press IPC to comply and will answer that matter subj for Iraq discussions with company which may strongly object on econ grounds.

Dept preliminary views which follow wld tend to support project on grounds of practicability but oppose project on principle:

(a) Completion of old twelve-inch line and unfinished sixteen-inch line to Leb coast wld utilize over one thousand miles of idle pipeline, increase Iraq revenues by some twenty million dols annually, improve IPC public relations in Iraq at time of FTC report, settle pipeline issue which has no appparent chance of settlement thru Israel in foreseeable future.

(b) This development which first raised by Fr in 1948 has seemed to Dept almost inevitable unless gen Arab-Israel rapprochement cld be effected. Unfortunately econ boycott does not appear to be decreasing in intensity with time.

(c) Econ grounds might not offer conclusive opposition to diversion. IPC is considered heavily extended financially in current expansion program which does not include "Haifa lines". Company also reported anxious recoup dividends before further commitments. However, diversion wld utilize two 550-mile pipelines which have been standing idle for four years with only a 75-mile stretch to sea uncompleted. Distance from Mafraq to Sidon is only 20 miles longer than from Mafraq to Haifa. Harbor facilities and mountainous terrain wld increase IPC costs which however shld quickly be amortized when line in operation. Brit partners in IPC wld thus find their Haifa refinery permanently dependent on tankers but this situation normal in oil industry and in any case appears only alternative available.

(d) Israel reaction wld presumably be strong altho they may be somewhat resigned to development at this point. Perhaps recent Israel claims re their own indigenous oil resources will serve to decrease importance this issue or cld be so utilized if necessary. Dept unaware that Israel Govt prepared or able make any concessions which wld reopen Haifa flow.

(e) Most important consideration in Dept's view is however that such diversion wld constitute blow to Dept's efforts reduce Arab-Israel enmity and its hopes to develop rapprochement in long run. Pipeline diversion wld fix positions, firmly establish Arab policy of long-term econ boycott, and futher insure isolation of Israel from ME to obvious detriment of peace in area. This unfortunately appears to be precisely what Arab states desire. Such condition might encourage Israel extremists to endeavor break econ boycott by force fol historic pattern.

[4] For documentation on the suspension of crude oil movement through the Haifa pipeline in 1948, see Foreign Relations, 1948, vol. v, Part 1, pp. 4 ff.

Interested posts are requested to comment re this problem and particularly re practicability of (a) impressing Arab leaders with historic fact that danger of aggression may be increased if Arab imposed econ pressures become really effective; and (b) impressing Israeli Govt with argument that more efforts are needed on their part avoid provocative acts and to reach understanding with Arabs if pipeline diversion thru Arab territory is to be prevented. (a) raises question of over-all US policy re boycott which is currently under review.[5]

Problem will be discussed with oil companies to see if project can or shld be delayed further without jeopardizing IPC relations with Iraq Govt.

[5] The Ambassador in Iraq, Burton Y. Berry, recommended that if diversion of the Haifa pipeline were economically feasible, the United States should not oppose it on political grounds since U.S. prestige in the Arab world already suffered from the Arab conviction that this country favored Israel. The Embassy believed any attempt to use the Haifa pipeline as leverage in bringing Arab-Jewish rapprochement would probably backfire. (Telegram 340 from Baghdad, Sept. 11; 887.2553/9-1152) Telegrams 1543, Sept. 17, and 1660, Sept. 11, from London, reported the most persuasive economic argument against diversion of the Haifa pipeline was the fact that the immediately anticipated Kirkuk production and the contemplated Mosul production together would probably not produce oil at a sustained rate beyond the capacity of the already existing northern lines. Documentation is in Department of State file 887.2553.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Nitze)

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 19, 1952.

Subject: Problems of American Oil Company Operating Abroad

Participants:
	State	Arabian American Oil Company
	The Secretary	Terry Duce
	Henry A. Byroade	Fred Davies
	Paul H. Nitze

Mr. Duce began the conversation[1] by outlining the difficulties which his company and other American oil companies operating abroad were now in and foresaw in the future resulting from the Federal Trade Commission Report [2] and the subsequent grand jury investigation. He said that the impression had been created that the U.S. Government considered the American oil companies as being criminals or potential criminals; that this was having an adverse effect upon their effectiveness; and that it might very possibly lead to a decision by the host countries to conduct investigations themselves as to the propriety of the actions of the oil producing companies.

---

[1] A memorandum dated Sept. 16, not printed, was sent by Byroade to the Secretary of State to brief him on his appointment with Davies and Duce. (886A.2553/9-1652)

Mr. Duce also referred to the problem created by the subpoena of all records and memoranda. These records included not only memoranda with respect to matters which were highly classified from the U.S. Government's standpoint, but also matters which would be extremely embarrassing to the host countries. . . .

The Secretary pointed out that the question of classified documents was under active consideration and, he felt, that some appropriate procedure would be developed for meeting this part of the question. [3]

Mr. Duce had with him a chart showing the oil reserves of various countries and their status as importing or exporting nations. He emphasized that the oil reserves of the Middle East were at least three times those of the United States; that the great majority of the peoples of the world lived in countries dependent upon imports of oil; that the population of countries that were large-scale exporters was relatively small. He said that the oil reserves in the Middle East were not only an important asset but, if one contemplated the alternative situation where they were under the control of the Communists, this would give them a very important trading asset with respect to all other countries that were dependent upon imports for their fuel supply. He went on to say that if no solution were found to the problem raised by the Federal Trade Commission Report, he thought it quite likely that developments would result which could completely undermine the position of American oil compaines operating abroad. He thought that operations had already been affected, and that worse developments were to be anticipated.

[2] Department of State files contain an undated summary of the Federal Trade Commission's "Report on the International Petroleum Cartel." A handwritten, unsigned memorandum dated Mar. 31, presumably sent to Nitze, stated there had been a meeting on the subject the previous week, and Harold Linder wanted to discuss what should or could be done to avoid publication of the report at that time. (PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Strategic materials (oil)")

[3] The matter under reference here was addressed in a letter, dated Sept. 3, not printed, by Parker T. Hart to Leonard J. Emmerglick, Special Assistant to the Attorney General. According to Hart, interagency agreement had been reached on Aug. 28 on a paragraph which the Departments of State and Defense and the CIA recommended sending to all the oil companies receiving subpoenas. The paragraph stated that material in the company's files covered by subpoena which required special handling for reasons of national security should be segregated and sealed with wax in heavy envelopes marked "Special Handling—Attention Mr. Leonard J. Emmerglick," so that the interested departments and agencies of the government might conduct a preliminary joint inspection of the material in cooperation with the Department of Justice. (S/P-NSC files, lot 61 D 167, "Oil Facilities in the Middle East") No answer from the Department of Justice has been found in Department of State files.

There was some discussion of the Federal Trade Commission Report, it being pointed out that most of the matter dealt with referred to the 20's and the 30's—problems which had been subsequently dealt with. Mr. Duce said that Aramco had tried to keep the State Department fully informed as to its actions, but no one was in a position to tell them what to do or what not to do.

Mr. Duce said that he had been considering what could be done about this situation. He said he felt that there was some analogy to the situation existing within the United States in the period prior to 1924. At that time there was unrestricted competition between the states, accompanied by various abuses. At that time, President Coolidge had appointed a Commission, consisting of the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, and Commerce. This Commission had made various recommendations which had eventually resulted in the interstate oil compact and its accompanying machinery. Mr. Duce said he felt that the time might have come when it would be appropriate to contemplate some similar commission to look into the problems of the national interest with respect to the operation of American oil companies abroad.[4]

The Secretary said that he also had been disturbed by the possible repercussions on our national interest of some of the consequences which might be expected to flow from the publication of the Federal Trade Commission Report. The British, among others, had registered their concern. He felt, however, that there were certain problems which should be considered in connection with Mr. Duce's suggestion. The first one of these was that useful action might be difficult prior to the election. In the heat of a campaign, either side might well make political capital out of whatever was done. Mr. Nitze said that even though this was undoubtedly a problem, he was not sure that something useful could not be begun.

The Secretary then raised a question as to the composition of any such commission. He wondered how useful a report by Cabinet officers could be whose terms of office were about to be expired. He also wondered whether a report by a commission, composed of outsiders appointed by this Administration, would be considered adequate by a subsequent Administration. The Secretary also said that a problem was presented by the relationship between the work of such a commission and the pending legal action. Clearly an investigation by a commission could not and should not infringe upon consideration of a case before the courts.

[4] On Oct. 22, Duce called from New York to leave a message for Nitze, informing him that Duce had talked with Secretary of the Interior Chapman the previous day, and the Secretary had agreed to take up with the President the creation of a Cabinet Commission on the problems of national interest with respect to the operation of American oil companies abroad. (Memorandum of telephone conversation, Oct. 22; PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Strategic materials (oil)")

The Secretary then asked what issues such a commission might consider and what type of recommendation it was envisaged such a commission might make. At this point the Secretary had to leave temporarily to receive a visiting ambassador.

In the ensuing discussion, the following points were developed. A Commission might find that the operations of American oil companies abroad were affected with a public interest going beyond the range of interest of the antitrust laws and affecting our security interests and our foreign relations. It might also find that certain of the problems involved, such as the relative rates of developments of one producing country as against another, the continued assurance of adequate supplies to consuming countries, and the general price relationships of oil and oil products at various locations affected the national interest of other countries in addition to those of the U.S. to such a degree that international arrangements rather than purely national ones might be required to adequately deal with the subject.

Mr. Duce said that he felt that the American oil companies would be prepared to make all information available to any commission which might be appointed and would fully cooperate with any recommendations which were made.

After the Secretary returned to the meeting, there was some discussion of other elements which bore upon the current situation of American oil companies operating abroad, including the MSA suit and the developments in Iran. With respect to the MSA suit, Mr. Duce said that he would prefer not to discuss the matter since his company was one of the companies involved. With respect to Iran, the Secretary asked Mr. Duce how much oil he thought Iran would be able to sell in the absence of a settlement with AIOC. Mr. Duce felt that they might be able to sell between 100–150,000 barrels per day, but he thought this would take a considerable period of time.

SECRET WASHINGTON, September 24, 1952—7:39 p. m.

341. Re Iraqi Govt proposal divert Haifa pipeline at Mafraq, Brit Emb Rep disclosed IPC wld reply to Iraqis along fol lines:

(1) Diversion wld be more expensive way transport extra oil which IPC already planning send through Northern line. Increase in capacity over Northern line by increasing pressure wld be quicker and wld cost one quarter as much.

(2) New alignment from Mafraq to Sidon wld mean considerable delay while new way leaves being negotiated with Lebs and Syrians. Also line wld be dangerously close Israel border.

(3) IPC plans send three million extra tons oil through North in 1952, further three million in 1953. This wld be carried out in manner which wld not defeat the object by glutting market and reducing prices. [2]

[2] Telegram 2327 from Paris, Oct. 15, informed the Department of State that IPC has answered Iraq's request to divert the Haifa pipeline by advancing alternate proposals which the Iraqi Government was studying. The Embassy reported the French had consistently pushed IPC for diversion, the British group was cool to the proposal because of the Haifa refinery, and the American group was neutral but had been largely instrumental in advancing the alternate proposals which had met with the approval of the IPC Board. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 30, 1952.

Participants: The British Ambassador
Assistant Secretary Byroade
Mr. Acheson

In the course of his call upon me this afternoon, the British Ambassador covered a variety of matters which will be reported by Mr. Byroade.

One matter which the Ambassador raised has to do with the attached draft letter [1] proposed to be sent from Her Majesty's Government to the British oil companies involved in legal proceedings in the United States under the anti-trust laws. The Ambassador asked me whether I had seen this letter and whether I had any comments to make regarding it. I said that I had seen the letter and that I thought the British Government would wish to reconsider the wisdom of sending it for two reasons:

1. The letter covered documents some of which might well be within the jurisdiction of the United States and subject to the orders of its courts. In regard to these documents which were very broadly and vigorously described so that their identification would have to be left to the discretion of the oil companies themselves, the letter directed they should not be provided in response to orders, subpoenas or requests made or issued in connection with the proceedings in the United States under the anti-trust laws. I felt sure that the British Government could not intend to direct British companies to disregard orders of the United States courts and that it would wish to study this phase of the matter further.
2. The letter also applied to documents which might be within the jurisdiction of the British Government or other governments than the United States. So far as those within the jurisdiction of Great Britain were concerned, British authority over them was very great indeed.

It might also be considerable over those in other jurisdictions. But even so, I doubted whether the British Government would wish out of hand to direct its subjects not to produce papers so broadly and vaguely described. Although the British interest in these papers was undoubted, the British Government might well consider it wise to discuss this matter with the legal authorities in the United States before coming to so drastic a conclusion.

The Ambassador thanked me for my comments and said that they would be given careful consideration.

[1] Not printed. The letter stated the British Government considered it contrary to its national interest for British oil companies or British nationals to provide information relating to their business outside the United States, which might prejudice the conduct of business or endanger the economic, strategic, or political interests of the Western powers, in response to subpoenas issued in connection with antitrust proceedings in the United States. The letter ended by stating that documents, papers, or other information should not be provided. (811.054/9-3052)

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Linder)

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, October 29, 1952.[1]

Subject: "Oil Cartel"—Federal Anti-Trust Suit.

Participants: James Terry Duce, Aramco
Paul H. Nitze, S/P
Harold F. Linder, E

Mr. Duce came in to give us a little of the background relating to his letter to the Secretary of Interior and accompanying memorandum.[2] After his talk with the Secretary some time, ago, he called on Mr. Lovett, who agreed that action needed to be taken and Mr. Sawyer, who concurred, and then on Mr. Steelman. The last took the position that a mistake had been made in proceeding with the suit and that he thought that the Secretary of the Interior was the proper man to bring the matter forcefully to the attention of the President. Mr. Chapman stated that he had not been consulted when the decision was made to proceed with the suit and he undertook to present his views, which coincided with those of Mr. Duce, to the President. The Secretary of Interior requested Mr. Duce to prepare a background memorandum and a letter which might be addressed by the President to the Secretaries of State, Defense, Interior and Commerce. He also suggested that Mr. Duce might wish to undertake to prepare an executive order. This, in addition to the paper submitted, is in the course of preparation.

Mr. Duce stated that he did have some degree of concern about the reaction of the domestic oil industry were the suit to be dropped and plans to talk to Mr. Russell Brown who represents the Independent Petroleum Association. He hopes to convince Brown that the procedure recommended will be in the long-run interest of his clients. Mr. Nitze asked Mr. Duce whether his principals were fully aware of this proposal and approved it, to which Duce replied that they were aware but not committed. (Admiral Kelly, Washington representative of Socony-Vacuum sent me the papers prepared by Mr. Duce, so one can assume that the parents of Aramco approve.)

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Oct. 30.

[2] Attached to a memorandum by Watts to Kitchen, Byroade, Linder, and Fisher, dated Oct. 24, not printed, were copies of a letter from Duce to Chapman; a memorandum by Duce to Chapman dealing with the Grand Jury investigation of the oil companies; and a letter by Duce which he suggested Chapman recommend the President send to the Secretaries of State, Defense, Commerce, and the Interior. (PPS files, lot 64 D 563, "Strategic materials (oil)")

After Mr. Nitze had indicated our concern with the international repercussions of the suit, he said that we nevertheless, as Government servants, were charged with upholding U.S. laws. To this Duce replied that he for one had always favored the elimination of practices which could properly be construed as violations of our own law.

The Embassy's economic officer had pointed out to Hakim, the Minister of Finance, the many arguments against renegotiation, but Hakim said the government was not willing to face a parliamentary dispute over the IPC agreement, which it was sure could not be ratified. He assured the Embassy Lebanon would not be unreasonable, but both he and President Chamoun felt the pipeline companies could easily afford a higher transit fee. (887.2553/10-3152)

The local IPC representative hoped to return with advice to the President that IPC was willing to negotiate a new agreement which would incorporate some basic terms from the original convention and the May 1952 agreement. November 22 to November 29. At the request of the Saudi Arabian Minister of Finance, the November talks were purely exploratory in character and centered around the question of pricing. No Saudi Arabian officials attended, Saudi Arabia being represented by Lewis W. (Despatch 157 from Jidda, December 6; 886A.2553/12-652) After a short suspension, during which the Aramco group returned to Dhahran to consult with the President and Chairman of the Board, negotiations were reconvened in Riyadh from December 4 to December 10. At the December meeting, the Aramco Delegation was headed by the Chairman of the Board of Aramco. The Saudi Arabian Delegation was headed by Prince Sultan, Emir of Riyadh; and included the Minister of Finance, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, and McNaughton. No decision was reached on the price of oil at the December meeting, and the two sides decided to adjourn until March 7, 1953. (Despatch 172 from Jidda, December 16; 886A.2553/12-1652)

A-869. Re Embtel 3058 [2] and 3083 [3] current Dept views transit problem fols:

1. Dept finds ostentatiously successful oil industry unavoidably destined to be a primary target for Arab anger and frustration with their lot and with West. Vengeance for Western support of Israel inevitably will be taken out on oil vital to West. Demands

[1] Drafted by Eakens and cleared by NE and OMP. Repeated to Amman, Baghdad, Beirut, Damascus, Jidda, and Paris.

[2] Dated Dec. 1, not printed. It reported a representative of Socony told the Embassy the IPC board had decided not to discuss the 50-50 concept in relation to pipelines, and would stick to some transit fee arrangement equivalent to approximately two shillings per ton. (883.2553/12-152)

[3] Dated Dec. 2, not printed. A Foreign Office official had been told by Shell officials that the IPC board had decided in a Middle East meeting that it would be desirable for the American and French Ambassadors in Damascus to let it be known that their governments did not favor extension of the 50-50 principle to pipeline transit fees. IPC felt it would not be helpful for the British Ambassador to take the lead since Britain had been in the forefront of much recent Middle East oil controversy. (883.2553/12-252) for more of everything from Western oil companies has double attraction of gaining more at expense of West. This pressure most probably will tend towards decreasing profits to oil cos and taxes to Western Govts and eventually increasing price oil to West, this movement continuing until demonstrably shown that Arab states hurt by this tactic. Worst possibility which cld result from strained situation found in ME today wld be further nationalization of oil properties which Dept does not visualize at this time but which will always be threat. In national interest as distinct from commercial interest, some accommodation to pressure for increased payments if necessary, coupled with play for time seems only alternative feasible at this time. Do not believe present is time or case for diplomatic intervention.

2. There exist only very few pipe lines which cross internatl boundaries. Only others Dept knows about are lines connecting points in US and Canad. On these lines a US pipe line co collects a charge or a tariff from the shipping point in the US to the Canad border. Out of this income the US pipe line co makes the fol payments for right-of-way and as taxes: (a) fixed fee to private surface landowner for right-of-way; (b) property taxes, based on the value of the pipe line property within the jurisdiction, to states, counties, school districts, and other taxing jurisdictions and possibly other taxes in some states, such as income taxes; (c) Federal pipe lines transportation tax equal to 4½ per cent of the transportation charge; and (d) Federal corporate income taxes equal to 52 per cent of the co's profits. The total of these payments obviously exceeds 50 per cent of the profits realized from the segments of internatl pipe lines located in the US. Based upon US practice, Middle East Govts might well adduce arguments for payments which exceed 50 per cent of the profits of segments of pipe lines in their territory since they are functionally in the same position as the collectors of all of the above-mentioned payments made by US pipe lines.

Co arguments which the Dept has heard in favor of the fixed fee basis of payments neglect some of these factors and generally fail to recognize the multiple position of the ME Govts.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Dept as yet has not concluded that a 50–50 profit-sharing agreement is the answer to the pipe line transit problem in the ME at this time. It has not seen any analysis by the companies of the merit of 50–50 versus fixed fee payments for transit rights. Before reaching any conclusion it needs such an analysis for consideraton and use in its own studies of the problem. The Dept plans to request interested companies for a full analysis of the problem. The companies, however, already appear to have accepted the 50–50 principle in regard to pipe lines in their splitting of profits with Iraq on transportation to Iraq border.

Even though the 50-50 basis of payments might be considered sounder and more desirable, the Dept does not necessarily believe that it shld be initiated at this time. As indicated in para 1, cos may consider their best tactics for the time being to yield only if necessary, and then only the minimum amount required to reach an agreement. A fairly strong case can be made for this course since it may be some time before one can safely conclude that any agreement is really stable. This is all the more reason why both the cos and the US Govt ought to apply their best thought to this problem and decide what basis of payments should be the one on which sometime in the future a determined effort will be made to hold the line on payments. Without such an over-all plan agreements reached as a matter of expediency might well get out of line with the most desirable over-all solution to the problem.

At the present time it appears to the Dept that the only principle which has any chance of popular acceptance and understanding is that of the 50-50 sharing of profits based in the case of Tapline on the 66 cent differential between Ras Tanura and Sidon. While some co officials argue that this differential is not a pipe line tariff, it wld seem to make little difference whether or not this argument is technically valid. The differential exists and its existence is well known. The ME Govts know, or can guess, that the pipe lines are very profitable. Tapline has admitted to SAG that the operating costs of Tapline are 26 cents per barrel. In these circumstances it hardly seems likely that ME Govts will be satisfied with anything less than an equitable participation in the profits of pipe lines going through their territory.

3. It is untrue that differences within US Govt circles re merits of the fixed fee versus the 50-50 principle are delaying a decision re position the Ambassador shld take with Syria. No company has asked the Dept to take a position on the Syrian pipe line transit problem. Dept does not plan to instruct U.S. Ambassadors to take any position re fixed fees or other commercial questions at this time. In no case would the Dept take a position until it had fully studied the matter and had discussed all of its aspects with the interested oil companies, the UK, and possibly other interested govts. Dept will continue to recommend that field missions emphasize whenever appropriate disadvantages and other implications developing from the failure foreign govts to honor valid contracts. The Petroleum Attaché in the United Kingdom (Moline) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL LONDON, December 17, 1952.

No. 2872

Subject: Middle East Pipeline Conventions

Introduction:

The question of payments to governments of countries crossed by oil pipelines has recently become active in the Middle East with Lebanon's refusal to ratify its May 1952 agreement with the Iraq Petroleum Company and with Lebanon and Syria both indicating the belief that they are entitled to higher pipeline payments than they would get from agreements of the most recent type. Their requests variously put and variously interpreted appear to be aimed at obtaining a share of the "profits" from the pipeline equal to the share obtained by IPC.

The fact that "profits" are undefined and exceedingly difficult to define has not hindered the requests. Neither have demands for some sort of 50-50 division been precluded by the fact that agreements with Tapline have been recently concluded on a different basis and that Lebanon concluded an agreement, still unratified, only last May, with IPC on a fixed fee basis. On the contrary, both Syria and Lebanon indicate their intention to denouce the Tapline agreements.

Tapline has said it will not countenance a reopening of its recently concluded pipeline agreements. IPC too has firmly resisted Syrian demands for pipeline payments on a 50-50 profit sharing basis. The IPC has contended for reasons indicated below that the 50-50 principle for pipelines is unsound, unworkable and unjustified.

Originally the company believed that it could with a show of firmness settle with Syria on the same basis as Tapline had done, making due allowance for the greater IPC mileage in Syria and the loading port at Banias. One senior IPC official has recently said that no agreement on a fixed fee basis can be reached. Other sources say that IPC is already considering some alternative approach, apparently based on the pipeline tariff approach with taxation of profits on a nondiscriminatory rate.

Whether or not the present negotiation can be settled on the fixed fee basis, which has hitherto applied in the Middle East, it does not seem likely to hold for long unless the fee can be given status as an equitable one or contracts establishing such fees can be given a sanctity which oil contracts have not enjoyed recently in the Middle East. Eventually, if not in the present negotiations, some new approach to transit payments seems likely to be needed. The United States and United Kingdom Governments must concern themselves with the problem in order to insure, if possible, equitable arrangements conducive to stability in the area and meriting governmental support which they should have.

What are the alternatives? They seem to be the fixed fee, the 50-50 sharing of profits however calculated and the pipeline tariff approach.

Objectives:

In trying to decide on the appropriate course in the event that the present discussions become deadlocked or future controversy develops, the guide lines for reaching the decision should be the objectives we seek to attain in the Middle East.

The basic objective is the promotion of stability in the Middle East, based on its economic well being, which will guarantee both the security of Western oil interests and the furtherance of Western security objectives in the region.

In the narrow sphere of petroleum developments, we should be seeking agreement among the interested parties on rules for oil operations in the area which will be generally regarded as equitable. Such rules and the financial interpretation of them should result in less controversy and more local income. Also, they should provide both standards for judging disputes which may arise and a basis for world understanding of the Western position if any major disagreement should develop. To further the economic well-being of the area and the stability and security we seek, it would be desirable for income from oil operations in the Middle East to be spread as widely as can be reasonably and economically justified. If by application of different standards or a change in practice, or the choice of one course rather than another, more of the profitability of oil production and sale can be attached to transport, refining and distribution and less to production, it would seem desirable that such a course be followed. Particularly is this so when the costs of tankers, pipelines, storage, refineries, etc., seem certain to be far greater for handling additional increments of Middle East oil than the costs of bringing such increments to the well head.

Pros and Cons of Various Alternatives:

It should be clear at the outset that the IPC is not trying to be niggardly in its fixed fee approach. It is apparently prepared to make fairly substantial payments. It is probably also true that governments which talk 50–50 are more interested in the money than in the principle.

Fixed Fee: The chief argument for the fixed fee is that agreements on this line are not only usual in the Middle East, but they have also been concluded very recently on such lines. To move to a new system would almost certainly unsettle the Tapline agreements with the various countries through which Tapline passes and would therefore still further undermine the much abused sanctity of contract principle.

A strong argument can be made also that the transit rates granted to a country are only rental fees for use of a small amount of land which in most instances is of limited value for other purposes. Since the line does not take anything from the resources of the country in the same manner as the export of a country's oil, there is no justification for the 50% sharing of profits comparable to the case of the producing country whose natural wealth is being permanently removed. Moreover, construction of the line will have contributed employment opportunities to the country during the building and frequently some employment opportunities in connection with pumping stations when the line is complete.

Another significant advantage of the fixed fee is that there is only one main item about which to argue with a country—namely, the size of the fixed fee. In the other alternatives several elements of the necessary formula can be subject to the kind of attack levied against the single item in the fixed fee arrangement whenever any excuse is wanted for reopening negotiations.

On the other hand, there are evident disadvantages with the fixed fee. They are almost exactly the reverse of the arguments for it.

The most important disadvantage is that there is no evident equity in a fixed fee, however fair it may be. There is no obvious reason why one particular fee per ton is any more just or reasonable than any other fee. Consequently, the fee is subject to challenge each time there is pressure for more income. There is no limit to the sum which might be demanded.

Insistence on a fixed fee settlement seems likely to lead to prolonged controversy, perhaps resulting in a stoppage of oil to the major disadvantage of Western interests in Iraq and elsewhere.

A 50-50 Formula: Of the three alternatives mentioned herein, this one has the greatest initial appeal to the countries. Without being sure of what it is they are talking about, the concept of 50-50 seems to have fired the local imagination subject, of course, to the qualification that 50-50 is understood to mean a fairly substantial return. That this principle has some degree of acceptance is evidenced by the request for settlement on these lines.

It should be possible also to devise a formula based on Tapline and the alternative tanker transport which would have a superficial appearance at least of reasonableness and which should not be markedly out of line with the present scale of payments if the charges for amortization are substantial.

This type of formula should not penalize the producing countries of Saudi Arabia and Iraq unduly since both countries have a substantial amount of pipeline mileage within their borders on which they would presumably be getting a 50-50 division.

Already there is some precedent for a 50-50 division of rates on pipeline operation in the Middle East in that the value of Iraq crude for the purposes of a 50-50 division of profits is calculated at the Syrian border on the basis of a formula which related the prices of oil in the Persian Gulf and the Mediterranean to the mileage of a theoretical pipeline between the two points. Though it was not intended to regard this Iraq-Syrian border price as a distinct price from that on oil at the well head, still it is an easy calculation to push the price back to well head by reference to the same figure per mile used in the calculation of the border price. As a matter of fact, the establisment of the border price appears to have overlooked the fact of the rapid amortization of the investment in Iraq pipelines and to have given Iraq a very much larger return on the transport element in Iraq oil at the border than would have derived from the more conservative calculations which would seem to be justified.

The questions of a different price at the first main gathering station and at the Saudi Arab-Jordan border is still unresolved. If agreement is reached on two different values at these points, further support would be given to the thesis that value is being assigned by virtue of transport, and that profits accruing in such a transaction are in fact being divided on a 50-50 basis.

The disadvantages of the 50-50 principle are two in particular. First of all, no one knows what 50-50 means for pipelines. The calculation of a formula would almost certainly be an artificial though rationalized one in which all of the elements would be subject to debate and only the posted prices in the Persian Gulf and the Eastern Mediterranean would have any degree of acceptability. It is possible, moreover, to foresee a situation in which oil from the Persian Gulf and the Eastern Mediterranean would have any degree of acceptability. It is possible, moreover, to foresee a situation in which oil from the Persian Gulf moving by tanker will go entirely east of Suez in a region where competition from other crude oil will be exceedingly limited and where its price may not have to reflect to the same degree as in the regional west of Suez the pressure of other crude oil supplies. In this situation the Persian Gulf price for east of Suez destinations might in theory be equal to or greater than prices in the Eastern Mediterranean for European destinations. In the present price relationships it is said to be 21 cents per barrel cheaper to move oil by tanker from the Persian Gulf to the Eastern Mediterranean than by Tapline, charging 66 cents per barrel. What in these circumstances is the profit on Tapline? And in any circumstances, is it not likely that oil companies will turn to use of tankers where possible if in the alternative case profits must be shared on a 50–50 basis?

The question of an appropriate tanker rate for comparison with an appropriate range of pipeline charges would also be subject to criticism and debate by the governments of countries through which the pipelines would pass. In the case of IPC in particular there would probably be reluctance on the part of governments to accept the notion of a difference between pipeline and tanker costs setting the measure of the savings to be divided when there was no room for use of a tanker in moving most of Iraq's oil.

Another feature of 50–50 which causes major concern is the fact that the limits of this principle are not foreseen. Is it intended to apply to loading, refining, storage and retail distribution? Should it be applied in reverse to reduce Suez Canal tolls? Even more disturbing is the fact that there has as yet been no United States decision as to whether tax credit can be obtained for foreign tax payments under 50–50 agreements. Should there be a negative decision, the effect on the availability of capital for oil developments abroad could be seriously unfavorable.

Pipeline Tariff: This alternative has not yet been tried in the Middle East. It would seem to have several advantages. The chief one is that it is defensible and possibly saleable on a principle and formula basis. In addition, it is in use elsewhere. In the United States where pipelines are common carriers and where there are examples of lines crossing state and national boundaries, useful illustrations of the principle are exemplified. Even better examples might be found in Venezuela and Colombia.

This principle, once its elements were accepted, i.e., rate of recovery of investment, rate of return on investment, costs of operations, etc., could provide bench marks less open to debate than formulae depending on the price of oil, representativeness of tanker rates and other elements of 50-50. Returns under it should be more stable than under formulae tied to oil and tanker markets.

The principle could, if desired, be given a 50-50 appearance, perhaps under a different name, if it were decided to relate the companies' return on investment to the countries' take from a small fixed fee for right of way and a non-discriminatory income tax.

The chief difficulty with the proposal is that the return to governments is probably closer to the fixed fees which have been offered than the sums deriving from their concept of 50-50 "profit" sharing.

Another difficulty is that a proper tariff ought to be on a ton-mile or similar basis. Since Lebanon's 30 miles of line is as essential to ultimate delivery of the oil as Syria's 200 or 300 miles, the former may believe that its advantage lies in pushing for a different solution than pipeline tariff.

Conclusion:

In considering the foregoing, it seems that the proper course of action would be to settle for the time being on a fixed fee basis provided agreement can be reached quickly and without bitterness on this basis, and also without prejudice to eventual settlement on a basis more likely to last.

Any time bought in this fashion should be used to refine the argument for a 50-50 profit sharing basis if there is an argument to be made or alternatively to marshal the arguments against it. It should also be used to decide on the appropriate elements of a pipeline tariff approach which seems by far the best one to take.

In any solution there are very real difficulties not the least of which is the proration of the return on any line among the countries through which it passes and among the companies concerned. Whether a solution will be accepted and whether it will hold firm will depend to a large degree on its evident justice and the willingness of the United States and United Kingdom Governments to give it publicity and support.

Considering the importance of the stakes in the Middle East, the United States Government should not hang back from taking an active interest in the problem of stable oil arrangements in the area. If it is to have responsibility for supporting the United States companies in their oil dealings in the Middle East (and it both has and should make evident its acceptance of this responsibility), it has the corollary responsibility of making as certain as possible that it is supporting a justifiable position, which it should therefore seek to influence.

In the present pipeline case it is recommended that agreement be sought with American companies on a pipeline tariff proposal designed to recover a pipeline investment, possibly on a replacement basis, within a reasonably short time and with interest on investment after costs of operation equal to the government's income from a small fixed fee and a non-discriminatory tax. Thereafter through American companies and the British Government, the agreement of interested British companies should also be sought. Finally, and assuming the necessary company and British Government agreement, the Unites States Government should lend its active support to obtaining the agreement of Middle East Governments to the suggested proposal and to insuring their continued adherence to the agreement within its terms.

It is recognized that no arrangement can be guaranteed as a stable one. Dressing them up as principles doesn't help at all in the view of the Gulbenkian interests in IPC. Perhaps equal sharing of income will hold only as long as new ways can be found to redefine the agreements to give more and more to Governments. The alternative of working without standards or bench marks seems certain to be unstable. With United States and United Kingdom Government support of positions based on principles they have approved, it may be possible to give them stability. It is worth an intensive try.

Memorandum by the Assistant Legal Adviser for Economic Affairs (Metzger) [1]

WASHINGTON, December 19, 1952.

THE CURRENT SITUATION OF THE ANTI-TRUST OIL CASE

At present, the so-called Anti-Trust oil case is not actually a criminal case against defendants; rather, it is a Grand Jury investigation into possible violations of the Anti-Trust statutes on the part of five major American companies and the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, and the Shell combination. Subpoenas have been issued for domestic and foreign records of the American companies; no subpeona has been issued to the foreign Shell corporations, while the subpoena which had been issued to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company was quashed by the court in its order of December 15, 1952. Under the court's orders of November 10 and December 15, 1952, the domestic records of the American companies must be submitted pursuant to the subpoena by January 12, 1953. Regarding the foreign records, the American companies must make good faith efforts to gain consent from foreign sovereigns to remove foreign documents in order to present them; the Court must be advised of these good faith efforts by February 2, 1953; where the foreign sovereign has granted consent, the foreign documents must be submitted for consideration by the Grand Jury by March 16, 1953; where the foreign sovereign denies consent, it shall be done through diplomatic channels in clear and unambiguous terms, and a preliminary hearing shall take place on February 16, 1953, at which time these refusals will be disclosed to the court, and the court will determine the proper procedure of presenting the proof and effect of foreign laws as they pertain to the question of enforcement of the subpoena; the presentation of such proof of foreign laws will then commence on March 2, 1953, in the manner ordered by the court at the preliminary hearing of February 16, 1953.

[1] Attached to the source text was a memorandum, dated Dec. 19, from Metzger to Armstrong, informing him that the paper contained some material for the oil paper he was preparing. (800.054/12-1952)

It cannot now be predicted what the court will do with respect to further orders upon an American company in the event that any foreign sovereign refuses permission to export documents of that company or its subsidiary located abroad. It also cannot be stated whether the quashing of the subpoena upon the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company takes that company out of the case for good; if the Justice Department were to appeal from the court's order quashing the subpoena, it may well secure a reversal.

If the case were continued along present lines, it does not appear that an indictment would be secured until sometime in the fall of 1953, or that trial would be completed until the end of 1954 and possibly later, during 1955. Appeals might result in a final determination not being made until 1956 or 1957. Since it is understood that following the criminal case a civil case would be instituted, and since the trial of a civil case might take substantial time by itself, even though evidence would have been obtained, the litigation in connection with international operations in oil might continue through the remainder of the decade; this time might be shortened if the civil case were instituted prior to the determination of appeals in the criminal case. It should be noted, in this connection, that effective remedies leading to a change in the practice of conducting oil operations abroad of American companies can only be had through a decree in the civil case. Fines and imprisonment are the only remedies on the criminal side.

If the criminal case were to be postponed, a civil suit by the Justice Department could, nevertheless, be instituted through the filing of a complaint. The foreign documents problem would be much the same in a civil case, since the Justice Department could, through discovery under the Federal rules, call for the production of documents relating to the issues in the complaint. If the basis of the court's order quashing the subpoenas on the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company is valid, Anglo-Iranian Oil could not be made a party defendant in the case, or, if made a defendant, could secure dismissal of the complaint; if, however, the basis of the court's order is erroneous, as may well be held upon appeal, Anglo-Iranian Oil Company would be a defendant in the civil action. It should be emphasized that the decree in the civil case is the instrument by which restrictive practices, changes in organization, etc., affecting oil operations, are accomplished. The institution of a civil suit during a postponement of the Grand Jury's proceedings would not preclude a subsequent institution of a criminal suit.

Memorandum of Conversation, by William McMaster of the Petroleum Policy Staff

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, December 23, 1952.[1]

Subject: Principle of Division of Pipe Line Profits.

Participants: Messrs. Duce and Chapman, Arabian American Oil Co. (Aramco)
Messrs. Noble and Britton, Trans-Arabian Pipe Line Co. (Tapline)
Mr. Funkhouser—NE
Messrs. Eakens and McMaster—PED

This meeting resulted from an offer by Mr. Britton to come to Washington for a discussion of the pipe line transit payments problem in the Middle East.

Mr. Eakens opened the meeting with a general summary of the Department's thinking and position on the matter at the present time. He said that contrary to reports in New York and even in London, the Department has taken no position favoring the application of the 50-50 profit-sharing principle to pipe line transit agreements. He said, in fact, that the Department has not taken a position on any of the substantive questions involved in this problem. The present fixed-fee basis of payments, however, seems to have certain shortcomings. Current payments are not established on the basis of any principle under which any level of payments can be defended as fair and equitable. There is nothing more sacrosanct about a payment of four shillings per ton of oil transiting a country than the payment of one shilling per ton. What seems to be needed is some principle of payments toward which the companies would work, on which a firm stand could eventually be taken. Such a principle would not have to be established at any particular time, but it would seem that both the companies and the government should have in mind as a long range solution the establishment of some principle on which an attempt could be made to achieve stability. Before reaching any conclusions on the problem, the Department wished to have the benefit of a complete analysis by the companies and their views in regard to it.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Dec. 29.

Mr. Noble said that some studies of the problem had already been made in New York. The studies had resulted in the conclusion that the one thing the three countries are looking for is equal benefits among themselves. He believed that this conclusion is an overriding consideration which should be kept in mind in any analysis of the problem. In every case, each of the three countries has asked for an escalation clause in their agreement, which actually amounted to "most favored nation" treatment. Mr. Duce added that the escalation applied not only to payments, but to benefits of every kind. It is "an ascending spiral" to which he does not see any end.

Mr. Britton said he had given the problem of payment for transit rights a great deal of thought. Speaking as an individual, not as a spokesman for his company. Mr. Britton said he would like to present an exploratory viewpoint.

At the outset, Mr. Britton said, you must establish a basic principle designed to stabilize the situation. He thought that establishment of the pipe line tariffs was the proper basis of accomplishing this. In order to determine the proper tariff, he thought a thorough study should be made which would cover, among other things:

1. The cost of the competing facilities.
2. The efficiency of pipe line operations. (It is to the advantage of the transit countries that pipe lines are competitive with alternative transportation facilities.)
3. Pipe line profits projected for 10 or 15 years.
4. The advantages to the countries transited by pipe lines based upon reasonable payments.

The views of the Department's representatives and those of Mr. Britton seem to be in complete agreement on the need for the adoption of some principle of payments in this field.

At this juncture Mr. Britton and Mr. Duce each read excerpts from confidential reports they had received from the Middle East which dealt with the adverse effect in the Middle East of the FTC Report and the cartel investigation.

In conclusion, the companies were requested to analyze the whole problem, including various possible bases of payments for transit rights together with arguments for and against each basis, and to submit the analysis to the Department. The company officials undertook to do this.

MEDRECO representative today inquiring of principals what if any approach should be made to Lebanese Government seeking clarify status its refinery agreement which like Tapline agreement was based on exchange of letter with officials [2] in previous government.

Tapline President Swigart states no formal approach yet made to his company beyond Finance Minister's inquiry Tapline Vice President Campbell around first November whether Tapline willing renegotiate which Tapline refused. Swigart stated Tapline informed by their Attorney Habib Abi Chahla that Prime Minister Chehab in his capacity as Minister Justice rendered a decision in writing to Finance Minister Hakim that Tapline exchange of letters constituting new agreement required Parliamentary ratification, but that subsequently Prime Minister withdrew this letter. Tapline Attorneys including Abi Chahla feel Tapline May 1952 agreement, since based on convention ratified by Parliament, did not require Parliamentary ratification. They interpret Prime Minister's withdrawal his letter to Finance Minister as recognition this fact.

Memorandum of Conversation, by William McMaster of the Petroleum Policy Staff

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, December 30, 1952. [1]

Subject: Current problems of Trans-Arabian pipe line Company (Tapline) in the Middle East.

Participants: Mr. Duce, Aramco
Messrs. Eddy, Noble and Britton, Tapline
Mr. Nitze—S/P
Messrs. Funkhouser and Dorsey—NE
Messrs. Eakens and McMaster—PED

This meeting was requested by the oil company officials to discuss current problems confronting Tapline in the Middle East.

Mr. Duce said the situation, particularly in Syria and Lebanon, has become so serious that the company considered it necessary to advise the Department of the impact of the situation on the company's operations and of the position it expects to take with respect thereto. He requested Mr. Noble to outline the company's views and their proposal for meeting the impending problems.

Mr. Noble prefaced his remarks with the statement that although he is a counsel of record in the United States Government's current grand jury investigation of international oil operations, his appearance at this meeting was not in any way connected with the cartel suit. He went on to say that some time ago he had requested the company's counsel in Beirut, Mr. Frank Bates, to prepare a factual report on the effect on the company's relations in the Middle East of the U.S. Government's grand jury investigation and the MSA suit against Tapline's parent companies to recover alleged overcharges on Middle East oil shipped to participating countries under MSA financing. Mr. Noble said that while he did not intend to discuss the details of Mr. Bates' report, he would like to point out that it did contain some very alarming facts with respect to the deterioration of U.S. Government and American oil companies relationships in the Middle East. The report concludes that this deterioration of relationships has manifested itself in new demands for a large share of oil profits. (Copies of the Bates report were presented Mr. Nitze and to NE.) [2] [1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Jan. 5, 1953.

Mr. Noble said the company had recently heard that the Syrian Government will call for a full discussion of oil company agreements in March 1952 and, of course, renegotiation of their agreement with Lebanon has already been demanded. The opinion of Tapline, as expressed by Mr. Noble, is that the company couldn't be in a more disadvantageous position to enter into formal negotiations with Lebanon than it is at this time because of (1) the popular prejudice against Americans by all groups in Lebanon and (2) pending negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government which must be completed before the company will have a firm basis for discussing any revision of pipe line transit agreements with the transit countries. At the moment the company has no basis for measuring pipe line profits. Therefore, the main question is how can they postpone formal negotiations with the transit countries. In this respect, Mr. Noble read a cablegram addressed to Mr. Swigart, Tapline's president in Beirut, Lebanon, setting forth the Tapline position. A copy of the cable is attached. [3]

The oil company representatives believe that it would be disastrous to their Middle East oil operations if Tapline should show any weakness at this time regarding the validity of existing agreements. In order to hold the line the company must; (1) delay any formal showdown, (2) stand firm on existing agreements, and (3) off-set the belief that the American companies are in bad favor with their own government.

[2] Not found in Department of State files.

[3] Not printed; it advised that the company should not refuse to negotiate, but should delay negotiations as long as possible. (880.2553/12–3052)

Colonel Eddy, who has resided in Lebanon for the past year, commented that the attitude of the Lebanese Government is wholly and emotionally anti-American which is, to some extent, attributable to Ambassador Locke's recall. Ambassador Locke had left the impression that he was going to have a $350 million development program [4] and now Middle East countries are looking for some other source for these funds. Lebanon as well as other Middle East countries realize that oil is the western world's vulnerable spot and for that reason the oil companies must bear the brunt of all political maneuvers in Lebanon and elsewhere in the Middle East. The new President of Lebanon, Col. Eddy said, is a very able man but he is allowing his Foreign Minister, to insist on large oil revenues in order to counter-balance other less favorable accepted actions of the new government.

Mr. Eakens outlined the activities of the Department with respect to these pipe line transit problems, mentioning that the Department has thus far taken no position in the substantive issues involved and that it has already asked the Tapline officials present for a full analysis of the problem and of the various alternative solutions to it. (See Department's memo of conversation dated December 23, 1952 re principle of division of pipe line profits.) [5]

Mr. Nitze asked the company officials what payments were being made to the transit countries under existing agreements. Mr. Britton stated that Syria and Lebanon were each receiving about $1.3 million annually and Jordan a little less.

In answer to a question regarding the costs involved in operating the pipe line, Mr. Britton said that the cost, not including gathering lines, was about 28 cents per barrel of which about 10 cents was for amortization of the pipe line investment on about an 18 year basis. Mr. Britton said it would be difficult to give an estimate of the cost involved in moving oil by tanker through the Suez Canal. He thought, however, that the cost per barrel on a 26,000 ton super tanker, some of which are in use in moving Middle East oil, is in the neighborhood of 26 cents.

In conclusion, the company representatives asked if there was any objection to the suggested position as stated in the cable to Mr. Swigart. The Department representatives said it would not be possible to offer any guidance until the Department has completed its analysis of the problem. No objection was offered to the suggested Tapline position. [6]

Report by the Departments of State, Defense, and the Interior [1]

SECRET
NSC 138/1

WASHINGTON, [January 6, 1953.]

SECURITY AND INTERNATIONAL ISSUES ARISING FROM THE CURRENT SITUATION IN PETROLEUM

THE PROBLEM

1. The Justice Department has begun a judicial process which can be expected to lead to the indictment and trial of the principal international American oil companies on charges of criminal violations of American law in their foreign operations. There is serious danger that the trial of these oil companies on criminal charges would be harmful to critical American foreign policy objectives. No responsible official can assert either that American law should be wholly inapplicable to the foreign operations of these oil companies or that our critical foreign policy objectives should be placed in jeopardy. The problem is to determine the course of action which in these circumstances will best serve the over-all national interest.

IMPORTANCE OF PETROLEUM

2. Oil is vital to the United States and the rest of the free world both in peace and war. The complex industrial economies of the western world are absolutely dependent upon a continuing abundance of this essential source of energy. And expanding economies, whether modern and progressive, or backward and underdeveloped, require ever increasing quantities of petroleum.

3. No other nation relies upon petroleum to such an extent as the United States. Petroleum and natural gas supply roughly 50 percent of the vast amount of the total energy consumed in the United States; our vital transportation system is far more heavily

Jersey. While agreeing it would be necessary to revise the principle of transit payments, the oil company representatives said they had no alternative solution to propose at the time but were still studying the problem and would meet again with Department of State representatives to discuss it. (880.2553/1-2253) dependent upon oil. National consumption of petroleum is at a rate of more than seven million barrels per day. This is over 60 percent of current world demand. By 1955, United States consumption is expected to rise to nine million barrels per day, and by 1975, to 13.7 million barrels per day. * Until recently the United States supplied its own requirements from its own indigenous resources. But this could not continue indefinitely. Proved crude oil reserves in the United States are now less than one-third of the world's total. In 1948, because of the tremendous increase in demand, the United States became a net importer of oil. Assuming the continuing high level of domestic exploration and development by a vigorous and healthy United States petroleum industry, it is estimated that by 1975 the United States will be using 2.5 million barrels daily more than it produces and this difference will have to be drawn from foreign sources. Without a vigorous and expanding domestic oil industry, the availability of foreign oil would be even more critical.

[1] This report is part of NSC 138/1, dated Jan. 6, 1953. It was transmitted to the National Security Council under cover of a note of Jan. 6 by Executive Secretary Gleason on "National Security Problems Concerning Free World Petroleum Demands and Potential Supplies." In response to NSC Action No. 692, taken at the Dec. 17, 1952, NSC meeting, Gleason transmitted three reports for the Council's consideration at its Jan. 9, 1953 meeting: (1) the report printed here, (2) a report by the Departments of State and Defense printed infra, and (3) a report by the Department of Justice printed as Document 281.

4. The free world is currently increasing its use of petroleum at an even greater relative rate than the United States. Since World War II foreign demand for petroleum in the free world has increased at a rate of about 14 percent annually, compared with an increase of about 7 to 8 percent a year in the United States. In total terms, foreign demand for petroleum has doubled since the end of World War II. The recovery and development of the free world at its current vigorous rate would be impossible without petroleum in ever increasing quantities. Although future increases in foreign demand are not expected to continue at the high post-war rates, they are nevertheless estimated at roughly double the rate of increase in demand in the United States. By 1975 demand from free European nations alone is estimated at 4.0 million barrels per day. With production of only about 0.3 million barrels per day, Europe's deficit to be supplied from non-European and non-United States sources will amount to 3.7 million barrels daily.

5. The total import requirements of the United States and Europe combined thus are estimated at 6.2 million barrels per day by 1975.

6. In war, petroleum is absolutely vital. It is indispensable to every military operation. In World War II, 60 percent of the total tonnage which the United States moved overseas consisted of petroleum and petroleum products. The petroleum which remained at home and went to defense-supporting civilian activities was no less essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

---

* All estimates for 1975 are drawn from the Paley Commission Report. [Footnote in the source text.]

7. With the increase in demand that will occur under war conditions, the successful conduct of a major war by the United States and its allies will be dependent upon continuing availability of foreign petroleum supplies. Due to the continually expanding world demand, the more extensive use of oil-powered military equipment, and the use of heavier oil consuming equipment, such as jet aircraft, the farther in the future such a war occurs, the more critical is access to foreign petroleum. Major sources of foreign oil are now indispensable to the economy of Europe and in the future may become indispensable even to the peacetime economy of the United States.

FOREIGN SOURCES OF PETROLEUM

8. There are only two known areas which can supply the import requirements for petroleum in the other countries of the free world. These are the Middle East and the Caribbean area, largely Venezuela.

9. The greatest known petroleum reserves in the world are those of the Middle East. They are now conservatively estimated at some 52 billion barrels out of total world reserves of about 101 billion barrels. Venezuelan oil is of special strategic value, due to its location behind the screen of our Caribbean chain of defenses, across sea routes relatively easy to keep open. It is closer than Texas to our Atlantic Coast consuming area. Venezuela alone is able to supply most of the foreign oil essential to the United States in time of war. In addition to our own import needs, Venezuela supplies substantially all of the import requirements of the Western Hemisphere outside the United States.

10. Since the United States is today a small net importer of petroleum, it is not now making any contribution toward meeting crude oil demand in the rest of the world. That demand, including the United States' deficit, of about 5 million barrels per day, is being supplied at the rate of slightly less than 2 million barrels per day from Venezuela, slightly more than 2 million barrels per day from the Middle East, and about 1 million barrels daily from the remainder of the free world.

11. Since Venezuela and the Middle East are the only sources from which the Free world's import requirements for petroleum can be supplied, these sources are necessary to continue the present economic and military efforts of the free world. It therefore follows that nothing can be allowed to interfere substantially with the availability of oil from those sources to the free world.

12. With the exception of Iran, the production of oil in those areas is almost entirely in the hands of United States and United Kingdom nationals. † These nationals have provided the ingenuity, capital, and technology to bring forth production from those areas on the tremendous scale required to fulfill world requirements. As matters now stand, they alone are capable of maintaining and expanding the production of those areas to meet the rising demand for petroleum of the free world. If United States and United Kingdom companies were for any reason expelled from Venezuela and the Middle East, the oil from those areas would to a serious extent be lost to the free world.

13. Where areas have fallen under Soviet domination, such as in Rumania, eastern Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, the oil has been lost to the free world. Almost the same result has followed from the expulsion of American and British oil companies from other countries for other reasons. Iran is the most recent example of nationalization. The repercussions of this action have led to an interruption in the flow of a substantial quantity of oil to the free world. While the initial interruption in such cases is caused by negotiating difficulties, the longer-run factors are know-how and capital. The record of nationalization and governmental operations in such countries as Bolivia, Mexico, and Argentina has shown that vigorous expansion of production does not occur, despite excellent prospects.

14. American and British oil companies thus play a vital role in supplying one of the free world's most essential commodities. The maintenance of, and avoiding harmful interference with, an activity so crucial to the well-being and security of the United States and the rest of the free world must be a major objective of United States Government policy.

15. Since the United States is the greatest consumer of petroleum and its products in the world (60% of total world consumption) now and for the foreseeable future, it is vastly important that the operations of the great oil fields of the world remain as far as possible in the hands of American-owned companies. We are gradually increasing imports. To be assured of these imports, and to ensure that this outstanding example of American investment abroad continues to make its great contribution to the American economy and the economies of other countries, it is essential that the American companies have full opportunities for profitable and expanding operations.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY OBJECTIVES

16. The operations of American oil companies abroad have profound effects on the conduct of American foreign relations. In the first place, oil is the principal source of wealth and income in the Middle Eastern countries in which the deposits exist; their economic and political existence depends upon the rate and terms on which oil is produced. American oil operations are, for all practical purposes, instruments of our foreign policy toward these countries. These oil producing countries are on or near the borders of the Soviet Union. For this reason and because of certain local conditions the Middle East comprises one of the most explosive areas of the world. The oil companies are in a position of great influence upon our relations with the peoples and governments of these countries. What they do and how they do it determines the strength of our ties with the Middle Eastern countries and our ability to resist Soviet expansion and influences in the area.

17. A major corollary of this is the fact that the internal economic development of these countries depends in good measure upon the operating policies of the oil companies. The United States has been pressing for economic development in the backward areas not solely for humanitarian reasons, but also on the assumption that economic growth contributes to political stability. Oil operations can accelerate that growth, and their cessation can block it. The rate of such growth depends to an important degree on the policies the oil companies follow. They can help or injure the political stability we need in the area.

18. A third factor which interrelates our foreign policy objectives to the operations of the international oil companies is their role as a supplier of western Europe's needs. The terms on which these needs are supplied are critical to the strength and balance-of-payments position of this area which is vital to our security.

19. The operations of the oil companies are also important to our foreign policy objectives in a more fundamental way. At this moment, and for some time to come, the United States and the Soviet Union will be engaged in a struggle to capture the support and the allegiance of political groups throughout the free world. We shall be arguing the case for freedom and dignity of the individual and freedom of enterprise, and we shall claim the virtues of our system in providing well-being and economic growth. The activities of the United States Government in petroleum must be handled in such a way as to avoid giving strength to the claim that the American system is one of privilege, monopoly, private oppression, and imperialism.

20. In this struggle of ideas on which our security depends, the oil companies of the United States play a significant role. Their operations extend throughout the free world. They are by far our largest overseas investment. In many foreign countries, they are the principal contact of the local inhabitants with American enterprise. What such people think of the oil companies, they think of American enterprise and the American system; we cannot afford to leave unchallenged the assertions that these companies are engaged in a criminal conspiracy for the purpose of predatory exploitation.

FOREIGN IMPACT OF FTC REPORT AND ANTITRUST ACTION

21. Before the publication of the FTC Report, the international oil companies have frequently been attacked in underdeveloped countries by governments and private groups on various grounds, and in some cases have been subjected to nationalization or lesser forms of harassment. Even in more developed areas the companies have been feared by existing local vested interests, in part because of their superior efficiency, greater technological abilities, and their great size, necessary for the vast scale of these foreign operations, and in part because they represented a broader and sometimes more vigorous and competitive approach. The companies in some cases have successfully resisted attacks from these sources; in others they have not been so fortunate. In either event, they have for a long time, because of the success of their operations, been vulnerable to the possibility that any derogatory information about them is likely to be seized upon by some elements somewhere in the world, to their disadvantage. The problem in part is to reduce this vulnerability of American oil companies to future attacks.

22. The governments from which the United States has heard officially and directly regarding the FTC Report and the antitrust action have been those of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, France, and Saudi Arabia. In each case, except France, the communications dealt with the question of making documents available to the Grand Jury in the antitrust investigation.

23. The United Kingdom Government instructed the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company and subsidiaries of other companies located in the United Kingdom to the effect that documents not relating to business in the United States should not be presented to the Grand Jury except with the approval of the British Government. These instructions have been made a part of the official record of the court proceeding.

24. The Netherlands Government, according to an aide-memoire of December 4, 1952 presented to the Department of State, has instructed all Netherlands oil companies not to furnish any documents in response to the subpoena.

25. The FTC Report and the antitrust action have been duly noted in the press in many countries. In most cases there has been some editorial comment, mostly in Venezuela and the United Kingdom. The press reports appear primarily to be based on wire services' accounts in the United States, and quote rather widely the reactions of the American oil companies, including references to the attempts to quash subpoenas, and predictions of unfavorable foreign reactions. In the United Kingdom, the FTC Report and the antitrust action have been thoroughly covered in the press, and most of the editorial comment has revealed a lack of sympathy for United States antitrust laws and apprehension over their possible application to British companies.

26. In Venezuela, the only Latin American country where any comment has developed, there has been an unfavorable press reaction, and a suggestion that perhaps a Venezuelan Government investigation of company activities should be undertaken.

27. Middle Eastern reaction in the press has not been highly significant, although apprehension has been expressed that successful antitrust action might decrease oil revenues for the Arab states. The communist, left-wing, and extreme nationalist newspapers have made some unfavorable comments.

28. The Soviet telegraph agency has printed two articles, and Radio Baku has made one propaganda broadcast, which found in the charges of the FTC Report and the antitrust action evidence of American monopolistic imperialism. Revelations which might be made in the course of the current Grand Jury proceedings, or as a result of a criminal indictment and trial, could doubtless be used and distorted by Soviet agencies in such a way as to injure seriously the prestige and security of the United States.

29. This entire situation is fraught with great potential danger to the national interests of the United States. For example, expressed reactions to date in Venezuela, many of which do not voice the threat of nationalization, are less important than the potential reaction which can well develop. The national economy and Government finances are dependent upon the oil industry, and political forces have unanimously backed radical overhaul of the present petroleum laws and the sharp upward revision of the benefits from petroleum to the nation. All political parties in opposition to the Government agree that ultimate nationalization of petroleum is their goal, to be achieved as soon as possible. The opposition has utilized the criminal proceedings to charge the present Government with incompetence and indifference in administering the national wealth, and has placed it in the position of sole Venezuelan defender of the foreign oil companies. A Government commission has already been appointed to investigate the companies' pricing practices, which are an essential feature of any cartel agreement. Since the present Government is aware of the benefits the industry brings to Venezuela and that the Venezuelans themselves lack the technical skill and marketing facilities to take over the industry, it has pursued a temperate course against its critics which, however, has dismally failed to stem the tide of criticism. The Embassy in Caracas has reported that the companies' broad programs for better public relations and cooperation with the Government have been set back years by the FTC allegations against them. In sum, the criminal action may well renew an era of recrimination and hatred, and stimulate a movement toward anti-Americanism and nationalization of all important foreign investments, including also those in iron ore. Indictment and prosecution would accelerate this trend.

30. The Middle Eastern countries were so long subjected to foreign political and economic control that the motives of any foreign enterprise are still suspect. Although the oil companies are doing much to allay this suspicion, the success of their operations nevertheless invites envy and dislike. Furthermore, anti-Westernism and anti-Americanism are widespread in the Middle East. These are the basic factors, and they are complicated by the feudal or semi-feudal structure of Arab society, in which certain groups may seek to avert or resolve existing frictions by resort to anti-Westernism. The FTC Report and the antitrust action add fuel to the flame.

31. In both Venezuela and the Middle East a wave of economic nationalism which might endanger American interests is entirely possible. Once such powerful political and emotional forces are unleashed, it is difficult or impossible to restrain them. The developments in Iran are an example.

32. There is, of course, no way of preventing adverse reactions arising from the FTC Report, because it has been published and widely disseminated. Therefore, it is hard to assess the full foreign implications of dropping or appearing to drop the antitrust action.

33. The United States is waging a constant struggle to dispel the concept, very much alive not only among communists but also in non-communist circles of the free world, that capitalism is synonymous with predatory exploitation. On the more positive side we seek to make the point that freedom of competitive enterprise is the economic counterpart of the concept of freedom of the individual in the political and social spheres. We have sought to lead the way toward a wide acceptance of this American way of life, and one of our best arguments has been that the productive achievements of the American economy have been attained largely as a result of the competitive system. Notwithstanding the constant action of the oil companies to expand production at home and abroad, there would be a risk that a United States failure to follow up our antitrust approach with respect to other aspects of oil company operations would be regarded as hypocrisy. This might add to the distrust of capitalism and free enterprise on the part of many elements in the world, and could impair not only the immediate position of the oil companies abroad, but also the broader interests of the United States as a whole.

34. One of the most disadvantageous features of the current antitrust action, in terms of foreign impact, is the fact that an investigation leading to a criminal indictment by a Grand Jury has been initiated. Although under American law a person or a corporation accused of criminal action is presumed innocent until judged guilty, this point is often overlooked by foreign observers. An indictment by a Grand Jury on the complaint of the United States Government, alleging crimes by the leading oil companies and their executives, is almost as effective in foreign propaganda terms as a decision finding the oil companies guilty as criminals and conspirators. This obviously harms the prestige of the companies in other countries, and can very well lead to an adverse effect upon the interests of the United States. Thus, it is concluded that American interests abroad will be adversely affected by the continuation of the present Grand Jury proceedings. Alternative means for dealing with this problem in the light of the foregoing considerations are developed below.

RESOLUTION OF PROBLEMS

35. The objectives of the United States in foreign petroleum require the continuance and expansion of the flow of oil from producing to consuming areas in the free world. United States foreign policy calls for the promotion of political and economic stability and development in the Middle East, Latin America, and other underdeveloped areas. American policy in free Europe requires maximum availability of oil at reasonable prices. United States domestic policy requires compliance with the antitrust laws on the part of the petroleum industry. The extent to which the antitrust laws apply to the foreign activities of petroleum companies is not clear, and judgment on this issue can be rendered only by the courts. The publication of the FTC Report and the initiation of the antitrust action have thus far had some adverse effect upon foreign opinion, on our national security, and on our foreign relations. Potentially great difficulties may arise as a result of the simultaneous pursuit of our security, foreign policy, and law enforcement objectives, unless adequate correlation is achieved. The purpose of the Government should be to seek the best means of moving toward all United States objectives effectively and simultaneously.

36. The point has been made above that a criminal indictment and trial of companies which are a major factor in American business abroad can scarcely be conducive to the development of confidence in American business institutions. A good deal of the difficulty caused by this fact could be removed if the criminal action were terminated, and any relief which the United States Government decides to seek were pursued in a civil suit, which might lead to a consent decree. In this way a trial might well be avoided, and hence a great reduction in the number of possible sensational disclosures brought about. Foreign reactions to a civil rather than a criminal action should be substantially less adverse to United States interests.

37. A second aspect of the difference between a civil and criminal action lies in the importance of correcting evils in this sensitive field, if they exist. Correction of any evils which may exist should in fact promote United States security and economic objectives in the foreign field. A criminal action such as that now under way leads to no substantial corrective measures unless and until it is supplemented by a civil action, resolved either through a court judgment or through the negotiation of a consent decree. At the same time, whenever there is a violation of the antitrust laws, a civil action ensures adequate enforcement. It entails less publicity, and brings corrective action more promptly.

38. A third consideration affects United States national security and foreign relations. While it is of paramount importance that American petroleum interests abroad act in a manner consistent with the foreign policy of the United States, industry expects Government support abroad and is entitled to such support, except when it acts contrary to our national interests. In many fields no legal or formal control over the action of American private interests abroad is exercised by this Government. This is in accord with the view that a minimum of regulation and control is an accepted American principle. On the other hand, this means that if Government and industry are to act together to promote foreign policy and security objectives in petroleum, there must be a basis of mutual confidence between them. Criminal proceedings are not likely to produce such confidence between the two parties in this dispute.

39. The fact that the FTC Report has been published and the antitrust action begun creates a series of issues between industry and Government. These issues must be resolved if the groundwork for future cooperation between them is to be laid. Corrective action, if and where needed, and a clearer picture of the interpretation and application of the law should make this vital cooperation possible.

40. The problem of international petroleum, with all its complex and diverse elements, should be reviewed by the responsible executive departments. A commission consisting of the Secretaries of State, Defense, Interior, and Commerce should be created to give careful attention to the interrelationships of antitrust, security, and foreign policies in petroleum. The commission should have as its specific task the development of recommendations to the President on changes, if any, in oil company practices or structure required by security, economic, and political considerations in the foreign field, which changes would have a bearing upon the remedies that might be sought in an antitrust suit. The commission's work should be of a classified nature, and it should be required to report on this subject within a specified period of time, for example 90 days from the time of appointment.

41. The commission's report could be used by the President as he saw fit, and presumably would be useful to the Attorney General in developing the specific form of relief which might be sought from the companies. The Attorney General will no doubt wish to have a reasonable measure of latitude, but the commission could well demarcate certain areas of primary importance in the foreign policy and security fields.

42. If this program—terminating the criminal action and establishing a Cabinet commission with the foregoing terms of reference—were put in effect, a careful and explicit statement should be made to the public both at home and abroad. This statement should explain why the criminal action was being terminated and what the Cabinet commission would be expected to do, and assure the world that security and foreign policy considerations would be major factors in the determination of United States action in international petroleum.

RECOMMENDATIONS

43. The Departments of State and Defense submit the following recommendations to the National Security Council:

a. The Grand Jury proceedings now under way should be terminated.

b. The President should appoint a Commission of the Secretaries of State, Defense, Interior, and Commerce (the Attorney General should be invited to attend the sessions of the Commission, and to participate to the extent considered appropriate by him and the Commission) to develop recommendations regarding our national objectives and policies in security, economic and political fields which have a bearing on the application of United States antitrust laws to the overseas operations of United States oil companies, and to the remedies to be sought in a civil antitrust suit.

c. The President should instruct the Attorney General to prepare a complaint as a basis for a civil action under the antitrust laws, if in the judgment of the latter this action is warranted, copies to be transmitted to the members of the Commission mentioned in recommendation b for their information as soon as practicable after completion but in any event at least 10 days before it is publicly filed.

d. An announcement of this course of action should be made by the President.

44. The Department of the Interior concurs in the foregoing report (not including its recommendations in paragraph 43), the report being generally in accord with the memorandum of the Secretary of the Interior (NSC 138), but the Department of the Interior does not either approve or disapprove the recommendations in paragraph 43 and does not join therein.

FOREIGN PETROLEUM POLICY

1. The question of the applicability of anti-trust laws to the international operations of the oil companies has called attention to the fact that there are many complex and intricate problems, of great importance in our national security and foreign policy, inherent in the situation. These problems are likely to be of substantial duration, and the effective disposition of the current action against the oil companies will contribute only to a partial solution of them. It is the conviction of the Departments of State and Defense that the entire situation needs to be examined in all its aspects by responsible Executive departments.

2. The Departments of State and Defense therefore recommend that the commission proposed in the report submitted to the National Security Council in response to NSC Action No. 692 be asked to undertake a full study of the problem, and to report within a year. For this purpose the Commission should have its terms of reference extended to include the following:

[1] See footnote 1, supra.

a. Clarification and development of national objectives and a national economic and political policy on foreign petroleum.

b. A determination of the security objectives of the United States and its allies in regard to petroleum and the development of a program for assuring the achievement of these objectives.

c. Examination of American foreign petroleum operations and recommendations as to the best means of assuring consistency between United States objectives and oil operations in such fields as pipeline agreements, concessional arrangements, marketing arrangements, and transport.

d. A definition of the proper role of the United States Government in regard to foreign oil operations, and recommendations on the development of effective cooperation abroad between the Government and the petroleum industry.

e. Review of the impact upon United States objectives of nationalism and tendencies toward nationalization in underdeveloped countries where oil is produced by American companies.

f. The study of petroleum problems faced by consuming countries, such as cost, assurance of supply, and machinery for distribution.

g. Review of relationship of anti-trust law and policy to United States objectives in foreign petroleum.

h. Consideration of intergovernmental relationships concerning petroleum, and recommendations on possible changes in these relationships.

i. Recommendations on means for coordinating United States Government action in the more complex situations where security, political, economic, foreign, and domestic influences come into play.

j. Recommendation for such legislation as might be required.

3. In making this recommendation, the Departments of State and Defense recognize that portions of this problem have been and are being attacked either separately by various Government agencies, or together through the National Security Council. This material should provide a useful background for the study now suggested. (NSC 97, 129/1, and 136 have a bearing on this subject.) The Departments of State and Defense believe that these efforts should be joined in a fundamental attack on the problem, for the purpose of evolving a truly national program, properly coordinated, and carefully designed to assure the clarification and achievement of the objectives of national policy in this highly important and sensitive field. Failure to approach the problem on such a basis can result only in recurrent crises and improvised solutions.

Report by the Department of Justice [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, [January 6, 1953.]

NSC 138/1

THE GRAND JURY INVESTIGATION OF THE INTERNATIONAL OIL CARTEL

1. Following cancellation of wartime suspension of anti-trust investigations and prosecutions of the oil industry, investigation of worldwide oil cartel activities was resumed. Much information had been obtained through file searches conducted under grand jury subpoenas in 1940 and 1941. Coincident with this resumption, the Special Committee of the Senate Investigating the National Defense Program, was engaged with public hearings on the same subject. The Chairman of that Committee had requested the Attorney General to look into cartel relationships which were alleged to have caused the United States Navy to pay high prices for petroleum products purchased from American companies doing business in the Middle East. Additional file searches were conducted in 1946 and 1947 and the American oil companies supplied copies of current contracts and other arrangements through 1949.

2. On December 2, 1949, the Federal Trade Commission passed a resolution to investigate "agreements entered into by American petroleum companies among themselves and with petroleum companies of other nations in connection with foreign operations and with international trade in petroleum and petroleum products." Subpoenas duces tecum were issued in January 1950. In order not to duplicate the investigative work of the Commission, this Department deferred further investigation until the Federal Trade Commission staff filed its report in October 1951. On December 2, 1951 the Select Committees on Small Business of both the House and Senate published a report on The Third World Petroleum Congress by Elmer Patman, appointed to investigate oil cartel activities. Thereupon a study and appraisal of all available material was made. The Attorney General decided that further investigation by grand jury process was necessary and recommended such action to the President who, on June 23, 1952, instructed that proceedings go forward immediately.

3. Early investigative efforts revealed the outline of a world cartel formed as early as 1928 by one American and two foreign oil companies. Over the succeeding years many other American companies joined the cartel. It appears that the uninterrupted extension and continuance of the basic cartel agreements have resulted in a world-wide pattern in which seven of the major oil companies—(1) control all major oil producing areas outside the United States; (2) control all foreign refining operations; (3) control patents, know-how and technology covering refining processes; (4) effectively divide world markets; (5) maintain non-competitive world prices for oil and its products; and (6) control foreign pipeline and world tanker transportation facilities.

4. Since petroleum and petroleum products are so essential to national defense, world economic recovery and defense of the free world, it is imperative that petroleum resources be freed from monopoly control by the few and be restored to free competitive private enterprise. Any full scale mobilization would depend more on petroleum products than upon any other commodity.

5. The domestic oil economy of this country is directly involved in and affected by cartel operations. Imports of crude oil into the United States are not free and subject to the natural competitive forces of our economy but are regulated by contracts and agreements between American companies. A cartel program for agreed upon imports is supplanting domestic production and retarding the drilling of new wells to find and earmark proven reserves as an underground stockpile, available for immediate production beyond present actual production. As Secretary Chapman pointed out on November 12, 1952 "We do not begin to have the reserve we should have in order to provide, not absolute security, but just the minimum of security that would give us room to maneuver in the opening months of a war". Deputy Petroleum Administrator J. Ed Warren publicly stated on October 31, 1952 that our domestic reserve capacity is less than one million barrels per day, which is only 15% of present domestic consumption. In his words—"That's a percentage much too small for comfort".

6. In order to maintain the fictitious pricing bases, the American cartel partners engage in uniform collusive bidding when our military seeks to buy petroleum products from them in foreign lands. The Department of National Defense has transmitted this evidence to the Department under the provisions of Title 41, U.S. Code, Section 151(d). The same pricing practices have been engaged in when selling to Mutual Security Agency for European delivery. At least three of the American companies have "over-charged" the MSA approximately 70 million dollars in approximately a 3-year period, on the basis of lower prices they charged on sales "among themselves". At the request of MSA suits to recover these overcharges have been filed by me. Prices for Middle East oil, delivered to any point in the world, are based on the fiction of American Gulf Coast prices plus delivery costs to a given destination.

7. The international petroleum cartel is a serious threat to our national security. Prompt discovery of its dimensions and effects, and expeditious termination of the cartel and its effects can be accomplished only by pursuing the pending grand jury investigation.

8. Noting that we do not begin to have the domestic petroleum reserve we should possess in order to provide even the minimum of security that would give us room to maneuver in the opening months of a war, the Secretary of the Interior has said that he is not sure how we can go about getting the reserve we must have, and that the present profit incentive alone may prove inadequate to produce the results we must have. This problem exists in the presence of a world cartel whose total operations and total effects are not known but can quickly be ascertained by the grand jury through the subpoena process which it has set in motion to secure the facts.

9. As with petroleum reserves so also with aviation gasoline—we teeter on the edge of a great shortage in the grades the military must have. The prospect is for increasing shortage unless something is done and done quickly, in the words of the Secretary of the Interior. While recognizing industry's reluctance to build installations for manufacture of the essential alkylate, the Secretary emphasizes that the military need is imperative. This condition, in a period of high productivity and high profitability of company operations, is traceable to the cartel, for the American companies, by working within the cartel, can make more money by investing it abroad than by creating additional domestic facilities. The Paley Commission recently reported that private American investment abroad in the petroleum industry has risen from 1.3 billion dollars in 1940 to 4.1 billion dollars in 1948; and that the ratio of earnings to book value on such direct foreign investments was 27.6% in 1948, whereas the ratio on domestic petroleum investment was only 22.7% in the same year. Here again the condition can be illuminated, and speedily corrected, only by going forward with the grand jury investigation. Any other effort to find the facts and correct them will take so much longer to complete that it will subject the national security to continuing and increasing hazards.

10. Moreover, the cartel constitutes such a complex network of close relationships and joint interests among the major United States and foreign companies as to inevitably identify and entangle the United States with economic and political decisions of foreign governments as to oil. The dangers inherent in this situation ought to be ended in the most expeditious way.

11. The cartel arrangements are in effect private treaties negotiated by private companies to whom the profit incentive is paramount. The national security should rest instead upon decisions made by the Government with primary concern for the national interest. Those private treaties and the other cartel arrangements have already served and can continue to serve as an agreed upon deterrent to development of our domestic resources by the major American companies. This is not to say that importation of petroleum and petroleum products should be discouraged. But the basic noncompetitive principle of a world cartel requires the major domestic producers to agree to give up both normal incentive and freedom to do the major work of enlarging our domestic petroleum resources. As a result, the cartel members, by their control over dominant segments of the domestic industry, regulate and determine the extent to which this nation shall be dependent on foreign supplies which could be cut off in time of war. *

12. This cartel has existed since 1928, but has been extended and complicated over the years. Its general structure and skeleton are known, but its total outlines and proliferating effects are not known. They could be uncovered by a Congressional Committee but such an investigation could not make any determination as to the legality or illegality of the multiform operations and their effects. In the presence of clear evidence of criminality, as indicated in the staff report of the Federal Trade Commission, the grand jury investigatory method is clearly indicated for two objectives must be achieved: (1) the cartel's total operations and effects must be brought to light in order that (2) it shall be promptly ended. These combined needs can be met only by grand jury investigation if the public interest in adequate petroleum supplies is not to be hazarded by needless delay.

13. Civil antitrust action is not adequate for the necessities. A civil complaint could be filed but it would have to be very narrowly drawn since only the skeletal facts are available. Similarly, an indictment could have been returned on the basis of the Federal Trade Commission's staff report and a small number of documents

---

* The industry itself through a January 1949 report of the National Petroleum Council, warned:

Imports in excess of our economic needs, after taking into account domestic production in conformance with good conservation practices and within the limits of maximum efficient rates of production, will retard domestic exploration and development of new oil fields and the technological progress in all branches of the industry which is essential to the nation's economic welfare and security.

Since the date of this warning the pattern of dependence of foreign supplies from sensitive areas of the world has become more deeply imbedded; indeed, by the end of 1950 the excess of imports over exports of petroleum and petroleum products increased by almost 350 percent. [Footnote in the source text.]

in the possession of the Department of Justice. But in order to do justice to the public interest and to be fair to the companies and their principal officials, it is essential that all of the relevant facts be known and weighed. A civil case, on the basis of experience with comparable activities, would require four to six years to complete. An indictment and trial could be concluded within twelve to fifteen months.

14. Conviction under an indictment will leave correction of the conditions found to be illegal to the companies by renegotiation, while a judgment in a civil case would put responsibility upon a judge to reorient a world industry by decrees acceptable to foreign governments. Correction will be accomplished much more rapidly and smoothly if the companies are obliged to set their houses in order, in view of the nature of the international petroleum industry.

15. The secrecy of a grand jury investigation makes it preferable to an investigation by any other means, such as a Congressional or interdepartmental committee, or a civil antitrust suit. Grand jury investigation will avoid the possibility of public, inflammatory exposures. The pending investigation is being conducted with the aid of a committee composed of representatives of State, CIA, Defense and Justice, specifically concerned with problems of sensitivity and the international repercussions of the inquiry, with provision for submission to the President of questions which cannot be otherwise resolved.

16. The Sherman Act was described by Chief Justice Hughes as our charter of economic freedom. The Supreme Court has repeatedly rejected proof of public benefit and business necessity as justification for cartel operations and has emphasized the primacy of economic freedom as the highest value for our economy. Our concern for an adequate future supply of petroleum is a concern ultimately for the preservation of freedom for ourselves and the free world. Free private enterprise can be preserved only by safeguarding it from excess of power, governmental and private. The selective socialization of business in the ancestral home of our free institutions points to the end result of the cartels which flourished and became the outstanding characteristic of the British economy after Great Britain adopted the Import Duties Act of 1932. The world petroleum cartel is authoritarian, dominating power over a great and vital world industry, in private hands. National security considerations dictate that the most expeditious method be employed to uncover the cartel's acts and effects and put an end to them. The urgency of these considerations requires that the grand jury investigation go forward even though it might ultimately appear that indictments would not be warranted. The facts presently available strongly suggest that the high policy represented by the Sherman Act has been consciously and persistently violated by activities long since determined by the Supreme Court to be illegal. The cartel should be prosecuted criminally if there is to be equal justice under the law and if respect for the law and its even-handed administration is to be maintained. Far from hurting us abroad, the investigation and prosecution of this cartel's activities will authenticate our protestations made continuously through the Marshall Plan, ECA, MSA, Point IV and NATO. We cannot promote free private enterprise and productivity abroad unless we are seen to conscientiously enforce our laws designed to preserve them for our own economy and our own domestic and foreign commerce.

Memorandum by the Counselor of the Department of State (Bohlen) to the Secretary of State [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, January 9, 1953.

Subject—National Security Council Meeting

The President approved in toto the statement of State–Defense recommendations in NSC 138/1 on the Petroleum Antitrust Case. Recommendations of State and Defense received the solid support of the other agencies which joined in the discussion (Mr. Snyder had no comments to make). Commerce, Interior, ODM, CIA and MSA all emphasized the damaging effects to our national security that the continuance of the criminal case would involve. Justice on the whole presented a rather weak case and in line with the paper submitted to the Council tended to stray into areas in which they were not as well informed as Interior. After hearing all the discussion the President said that his whole record had been one in opposition to the trusts but in this case he felt that the considerations of national security were overriding and that he approved the State–Defense recommendations to terminate the criminal suit and to request the Attorney General to prepare a complaint as a basis for a civil action as recommended.

After the President rendered the decision the meeting was immediately adjourned so there was no opportunity to discuss procedures. After the meeting I had a few words with Jimmy Lay who said he thought the President would wish to move swiftly on this matter and requested that we should let him have an announcement, as provided in the recommendations, as soon as possible.

[1] Copies of this memorandum were sent to Bruce, Matthews, Nitze, Linder, and Fisher. A handwritten note in the margin stated that the Secretary of State had seen it.

At Mr. Bruce's suggestion, Mr. Fisher is undertaking to prepare such a statement in conjunction with Defense and will get in touch with Mr. Lay for this purpose.

The question of whether Mr. Truman should appoint the Commission or should recommend its appointment to his successor was left undecided for the reason indicated above.

The President to the Attorney General (McGranery) [1]

WASHINGTON, January 12, 1953.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: As a result of factors which have emerged since the institution of the current grand jury investigation of the international activities of the major oil companies, I am of the opinion that the interest of national security might be best served at this time by resolving the important questions of law and policy involved in that investigation in the context of civil litigation rather than in the context of a criminal proceeding. However, I believe that this would be the case only if the companies involved agreed to the production of documentary material which the companies are required to produce under an existing order of court based on grand jury subpoenas.

Consequently, I ask that you promptly confer with representatives of the companies to ascertain if they will agree to enter into a stipulation to that effect. If they will, I ask that a civil proceeding be instituted accordingly and that appropriate steps be taken to cause the termination of the pending grand jury proceedings.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Byroade) [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 11, 1953.

Subject: Proposed Treasury Action on Auditing Aramco Tax Statements

Problem

It has come to my attention that the Treasury Department is now auditing Aramco's 1950 tax statement. 1950 was the first year that Aramco initiated the 50–50 profit-sharing formula in the Middle East which had the effect of transferring to the Saudi Arabian Government corporation taxes paid previously to the United States Government. Two offices in Treasury are apparently interested in this problem: the legal staff and the policy staff. It is understood that from a legal point of view Aramco is within the law; from a policy point of view it is understood that Treasury is most reluctant to take the full onus of allowing this transfer of tax and will recommend to the Secretary of Treasury that he first obtain clearance from Congressional leaders. [*] The question is what action, if any, is required of State at this time.

Background

The Saudi Arabian Government passed an income tax law in 1950 providing for a corporation tax which, when added to existing royalty payments, would give the Saudi Arabian Government and Aramco a 50–50 split of net profits. The company agreed to this tax on the grounds that taxes paid to Saudi Arabia could be deducted from their U.S. tax. Company lawyers were assured that this move was legal and could find precedents in Venezuela for this action.

The Aramco move quickly led to similar action by the other American companies operating in the Middle East. The net transfer from the U.S. Treasury is now probably in the neighborhood of two hundred million dollars a year. In order to become legally eligible for this U.S. tax credit Gulf in Kuwait went through a complete company reorganization, and Jersey and Socony in Iraq undertook incomparably complex and protracted inter-company negotiations with their French and British partners (and Gulbenkian) who in turn heavily involved the British and French Governments in this problem. The Department has fairly extensive files on these oil company negotiations.

[*] This information on Treasury action should be closely held within State. [Footnote in the source text.]

Discussion

Although it is difficult to foresee the precise results such action would have in the Middle East, the complications in the international oil business which would result from a negative finding on the part of the U.S. Government could be expected to be severe. It also is most probable that Middle East governments would react by forcing these companies to incorporate locally. The companies themselves might even recommend this course to the local governments. This would presumably serve to negate any negative decision taken by the Treasury Department and we might be just where we are now, plus a certain amount of publicity, which from the NEA point of view could be expected to be damaging.

Conclusion

I would appreciate your consideration and advice on this problem.[2] On a basis of the few facts at my disposal regarding the tax problem and having in mind the apparently fruitless and unfortunate results of the antitrust moves on an already upset Middle East, I wonder if it might not be in the national interest for the Secretary of State to suggest resolving this problem by Executive study and action rather than turn the problem over to the Legislative Branch of the Government. Such a course would seem particularly appropriate if it is established that the companies and Middle East governments can in effect force a ruling in their favor regardless of what the U.S. Government decides, i.e. by incorporation abroad.

[2] In a response to Byroade, dated Feb. 12, Phleger stated that he thought it unwise to try to keep the Secretary of the Treasury from discussing the matter with appropriate Congressional leaders and suggested Byroade or Linder inform the appropriate Treasury official the Department of State was interested in seeing a prompt resolution of the matter as quietly as possible in view of the foreign policy considerations set forth in the memorandum. Subject: Proposed Treasury Action re Auditing Aramco Tax Statements

Participants: PED—Mr. Eakens

ARA—Mr. Davis
OSA—Mr. Bernbaum
NE/E—Mr. Boardman
NE—Mr. Fritzlan
NE—Mr. Funkhouser

At a meeting on this subject this afternoon, the following conclusions were reached:

1. Change in existing policy of allowing U.S. tax credits for foreign taxes paid by American corporations could have serious economic and political repercussions on U.S. foreign affairs. Such a change might seriously affect not only the relations of oil companies with concessionary countries and the stability of their concessions but also U.S. foreign investment generally.

2. The information available regarding Treasury consideration of this problem is meager and the first move should be to find out from Treasury the facts of the case.

3. It was the consensus of the group that the Department should contact the appropriate official in Treasury to express the Department's interest in this problem and to request whatever facts Treasury can make available. Such an approach might be made on the general basis that "the Department understands that Aramco's 1950 tax return has now come up for final audit". It was considered that at this point an informal approach would be desirable. It was felt that the approach might most appropriately be made to Mr. Andrew Overby, Assistant Secretary of Treasury, by Mr. Linder.

4. Papers prepared by Mr. Byroade [1] and Mr. Metzger [2] on this subject are attached.

No. 286

786A.0221/3-1853

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 18, 1953.

Subject: Boundary Disputes Involving Persian Gulf Sheikhdoms

Participants: Mr. Harley Stevens, American Independent Oil Company
NEA: Mr. Jernegan

Mr. Stevens said that his Company had a considerable interest in the dispute between Saudi Arabia and the British over the boundaries between Saudi Arabia and the Sheikhdoms of the Persian Gulf. This interest arose out of the fact that the boundaries of the Kuwait neutral zone, in which American Independent has a concession, were not fully settled and any eventual changes would, of course, affect the area to which the Company's concession applied. He also mentioned that the concession included the territorial waters of the neutral zone and that here again boundary questions could arise as it had never been determined precisely how the land boundary lines should be projected out to sea.

With respect to the boundaries on land, Mr. Stevens observed that his Company would be pleased to see the northern frontier of the neutral zone moved to the North and would therefore welcome any attempt by King Ibn Saud in that direction. The reverse would be true, however, with regard to the Southern and Western boundaries. If they were moved in favor of Saudi Arabia, this would reduce the total area of the zone and hence the total area of the concession.

With respect to the sea boundaries, Mr. Stevens pointed out that a great deal would depend on whether they were considered to be perpendicular to the shore line at the points where the land boundaries touched the shore, whether they were considered to be projections of the land lines in the direction those lines took in approaching the shore, or whether some other basis was adopted. He recalled having seen a map prepared a few years ago in an attempt to make a fair division of the waters of the Persian Gulf among all the riparian states. This had given Kuwait and the neutral zone almost nothing and a vastly disproportionate area to Iraq despite Iraq's very short coast line on the Gulf. His Company would be very unhappy to see something of this sort adopted. For the present, he was not asking any assistance from the Department since American Independent had recently agreed with the British authorities to be guided by the British in the location of any offshore wells it might undertake to make sure that drilling was not attempted in areas which might come under dispute. In any case the question was not of immediate importance to the Company because it did not intend to attempt offshore drilling unless and until it had found oil on land.

Incidentally, Mr. Stevens said that his Company had been trying to get British concurrence in the thesis that Kuwait and neutral territorial waters extended six miles rather than three miles offshore. It based its argument on the fact that Saudi Arabia claimed six miles and since Saudi Arabia had a half interest in the neutral zone, it was unreasonable to restrict American Independent to a three-mile limit merely because the British only claimed three miles for Kuwait. An agreement had recently been reached and would shortly be signed by the Sheikh of Kuwait which did not precisely state that the territorial waters extended six miles offshore but which contained a formula that did in fact permit American Independent to drill up to the six-mile limit.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Richard Funkhouser and David Robertson of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 26, 1953.

Subject: Oil Discussions with British Embassy Representatives

Participants: Harold Beeley, Counselor, British Embassy
Angus Beckett, Petroleum Attaché, British Embassy
British Legal Representative
Mr. Byroade—NEA
Mr. Robertson—NE/E
Mr. Penniman—PED
Mr. Hart—NE
Mr. Funkhouser—NE

Mr. Beeley addressed himself to two principal points: (a) the status of 1952 U.K. note recommending close inter-governmental cooperation on Middle East oil problems and (b) the specific problem of pipeline transit agreements with Middle Eastern states. Counselor Beeley recalled that Assistant Secretary McGhee had suggested an Anglo-American statement in 1951 setting forth joint U.S.-U.K. oil policy for the Middle East. The joint declaration would throw support behind the 50-50 agreements. While this course had not been considered expedient by the two governments, Mr. Beeley stated that the U.K. was strongly in favor of coordinating efforts with respect to Middle East oil problems. Consequently, they had put their position into a formal note to the State Department in January 1952. [1] No reply had ever been received from the State Department and Mr. Beeley asked if it would not be appropriate for the U.K. Government to formally present another note continuing the latest thinking on this problem. He also observed that Mr. Eden had mentioned the desirability of continuing close consultations in recent discussions with the Secretary.

A Departmental representative provided additional background information which included the points that: (a) the U.S. Government discouraged the idea of a joint declaration as it might provide an upsetting factor rather than stabilizing factor in the Middle East; (b) the British note had not been answered due to difficulty which the Department had found in trying to formulate its position, particularly at a time when the Justice Department was initiating action against U.S. companies as well as British subsidiaries in the United States for violation of the anti-trust act; and (c) the Department had, however, recognized the need for close exchange of information on the Governmental level and had instituted monthly meetings with representatives at the British Embassy for this purpose. Mr. Beeley was apparently not aware that these meetings had been called from time to time at either the request of PED or the British Embassy and it was concluded that continuation of these informal meetings would be satisfactory to both parties without the necessity for a new formal note from the U.K. Government.

Regarding the specific problem of pipeline transit problems, Mr. Beeley stated that Middle Eastern states might endeavor to play off the British and American pipeline companies in the area against each other and felt that it would be in the interest of both the United States and Great Britain to try to arrive at a position which would serve to stabilize this situation in the area. He recalled that earlier his Government had suggested that IPC and Tapline get together to work out common agreement on their position with the countries transited. However, the anti-trust position of the Department of Justice had precluded the American companies from participating. Alternatively, the Foreign Office had suggested that each Government obtain necessary information from their respective oil companies and endeavor to arrive at a formula at a Government level. When the two Governments had agreed, they could each advise the companies concerned. Departmental representatives stated that the American companies had been contacted but were unable to come up with any conclusions with respect to a desired formula for governing transit payments. They added that the attitude of the Department of Justice may have a bearing on the willingness of the companies to participate in any plan whose purpose was to agree on a formula for transit payments.

[1] Not found in Department of State files.

Mr. Byroade stated that it was possible that in one or two decades the entire complex in the Near East may change from the present pattern of private company operations to a buyer/seller arrangement with the country owning the resources selling direct to distribution organizations. He added that some high level planning must be undertaken, possibly including new Congressional legislation, if the American oil industry position is to be preserved in some way acceptable to the countries concerned. Mr. Beeley observed that the Anglo-American oil agreement, had it been concluded, could have taken cognizance of just such a problem.

Mr. Beeley asked if Aramco could be made aware that Tapline back payments to Saudi Arabia might cause Iraq to increase its demands from IPC. He was informed that nothing Aramco was doing in this respect would prejudice the position of IPC.

Mr. Beckett confirmed that U.K. Governmental requests to British companies had been made concerning their views on the pipeline problem but that no conclusions had been reached by the British companies, let alone the U.K. Government.

Telegram 823 from Jidda, April 24, reported the Aramco negotiators had been summoned to Riyadh on April 19. Only one meeting was held, at which Aramco presented its pricing proposal, which the Saudis agreed to consider. The negotiations were then suspended for several days by mutual consent. (886A.2553/4-2453) Despatch 347 from Jidda, May 16, transmitted a detailed account of the Aramco proposal on pricing and an account of meetings held between Aramco and Saudi Arabian representatives at Dhahran for 4 days at the beginning of May and at Riyadh in the middle of May. During these meetings, Aramco representatives, although insisting their past payments had been reasonable, agreed to discuss retroactive payment back to January 1, 1952, as long as that question, together with pricing and other outstanding matters, could be settled all together at one time. When the Aramco negotiators refused to consider making retroactive payments for 1951, the Finance Minister told them they had made a mistake in not agreeing with his suggestions. He then announced he was withdrawing from the negotiations and turning the matter over to the Government to handle as it saw fit. (886A.2553/5-1653)

Subj: Aramco–SAG Soft Currency Discussions

Threatened revision of many of its selling contracts in Europe and the Far East has caused the Arabian American Oil Company (Aramco) once again to approach the Saudi Arabian Government in an attempt to soften the latter's intransigent attitude towards acceptance of greater percentages of soft currencies, particularly sterling, in the Company's payments to the Government.

On January 28, Aramco presented to the Dammam Office of the Ministry of Finance a letter, couched in very general terms, calling the attention of the Government to the fact that, in order to hold its own with competing centers of sterling-produced petroleum, the Company would, in the near future, have to be prepared to agree to a substantial substitution of sterling for dollars in sales to Europe.

Since the 28th of January, pressure has been put on Aramco's associated marketing companies by several oil consuming countries (England, France, The Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, Spain and Japan) to accept larger proportions of oil sales proceeds in non-dollar currencies. Britain alone, apparently, seeks to substitute sterling for amounts now paid in dollars totaling $8,000,000. Japan has protested the imbalance of its trade ($13,900,000 versus $830,000) with Saudi Arabia. Italy's views in this regard were reported in the reference despatch.

[1] Repeated to the Arab capitals, to Beirut for the Petroleum Attaché and the Treasury Attaché, and to Dhahran.

[2] Not printed; it concerned the Italian trade imbalance with Saudi Arabia. According to the Italian Minister to Saudi Arabia, the value of Italy's dollar oil purchases from the associated marketing companies of Aramco in 1952 was approximately 20 times greater than the value of Italian exports to Saudi Arabia. Unless Italy could substitute sterling for a large part of the dollars paid and find a greater market for its products in Saudi Arabia, it would have to stop buying Saudi oil and turn to the sterling production of Iraq and Kuwait, or even Iran. (886A.2553/6-153)

Aramco calculates that, should the European countries successfully press their present demands—the Company's only alternative to non-compliance with these demands is loss of its markets—the Company, after maximizing its own use of soft currency, would still have to substitute sterling valued at $12,000,000 annually for royalty payments now made to SAG in dollars. This would mean increasing to 42 percent (from the present 25 percent) the portion of royalty payments made in sterling.

On May 20, R.S. Hawkey, Aramco's Assistant Treasurer, flew to Jidda for discussion of this problem with Mr. George Blowers, Governor of the Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency. At the latter's suggestion, a letter was prepared for transmittal to the Minister of Finance requesting that the Government agree in principle to an increase of up to "approximately 40 percent" in the portion of royalty paid in sterling. The Company's letter stated that, while no such increase was contemplated in the immediate future, it hoped to obtain the Government's agreement to this principle in order to assure Aramco's associated marketing companies greater flexibility in negotiation of purchase contracts.

Privately, Company officials are not hopeful of obtaining the Minister of Finance's approval of this plan, His Excellency so far having adamantly refused to reconsider previous dicta to the effect that the Government would approve an increase in sterling only if accompanied by a corresponding increase in dollar receipts.

Memorandum by the Chief of the Petroleum Policy Staff (Eakens) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 3, 1953.

Subject: Department Views in Regard to Furthering Iraq Petroleum Company Transit Negotiations with Syria and Lebanon.

The Department has received a letter from Mr. Charles F. Darlington, representing the Socony-Vacuum interest in the Iraq Petroleum Company, requesting that the Department support IPC's position in the forthcoming negotiations for pipeline transit agreements between the Company and the Governments of Syria and Lebanon. He has also requested that we suggest an alternative proposal or at least give him our ideas if we cannot support the IPC proposal. The proposal of the Company which has also been submitted to the British Foreign Office is attached. No date has yet been set for the resumption of negotiations, but it is expected that they may again be taken up within two months.

[1] Drafted by Liebhafsky and sent to Robertson, Funkhouser, Corse, Dixon, Metzger, and Kirk.

A copy of the letter from Mr. Darlington and of the IPC negotiating paper are attached.[2] Would you please consider the attached papers, as well as the problem generally, so that we can discuss it at a meeting in my office on Tuesday, June 9, at 10 a. m.?

Crude oil moves from the fields of the Iraq Petroleum Company at Kirkuk (Iraq) through Syria for shipment from Banias via pipeline as well as via an older pipeline system from Kirkuk via Syria to Tripoli, Lebanon. A third IPC pipeline connecting Kirkuk with the refinery at Haifa is not currently in operation because of the embargo imposed by Iraq on oil shipments to Israel.

Crude oil also moves from Saudi Arabian fields via the Trans Arabian pipeline (Tapline) through Jordan and Syria to the port of Sidon (Lebanon).

IPC renegotiated its transit agreement with Lebanon in May 1952, but the Lebanese Government has refused to ratify the agreement which was signed with a previous Government. Tapline also renegotiated its transit agreements with Syria and Lebanon in May 1952, and amended its August 1946 agreement with Jordan in June 1952, to provide for additional payments to all three countries.

Some dispute has also arisen between Tapline and Lebanon regarding the renegotiated agreement. Some official pressure has been put upon Tapline to renegotiate the agreement on the grounds that it has not been ratified. Tapline's position is that the agreement was so drafted as not to require ratification. Payments currently are being made under the agreement and are being accepted by Lebanon. This latter would seem to constitute evidence of Lebanon's acceptance of Tapline's position.

It looks highly probable that the transit agreements of both companies with all these countries will have to be renegotiated in the not too distant future and the question is upon what basis of payments satisfactory and more stable agreements can be reached.

The position of Syrian and Lebanese officials is that the oil companies make a substantial savings in transport costs (over tanker costs) by employing pipelines to move crude oil from producing countries to Eastern Mediterranean ports. They further contend that this saving should be shared equally with transit countries, much in the manner that 50-50 profit sharing agreements are in effect between the producing countries (Saudi Arabia and Iraq) and the producing companies (Aramco and the Iraq Petroleum Company).

[2] Neither printed. The letter, dated May 28, said Darlington felt it would be most desirable if the Department of State could support IPC's position when the negotiations got under way. The negotiating paper, transmitted with the letter, dealt with Syria and Lebanon Transit Agreements. (887.2553/6-353)

The transit countries contend that this saving in the case of Tapline amounts to the differential between the posted price at Ras Tanura on the Persian Gulf ($1.75) and at Sidon on the Eastern Mediterranean coast ($2.41) or $0.66 as the value added to the crude oil by the pipeline transit. The Sidon price of crude has since been reduced to $2.29 thereby changing the differential to $0.54 per barrel.

The IPC case is not as clear as that of Tapline since there are no facilities for the export of Kirkuk output via the Persian Gulf as an alternative to transiting Syria and Lebanon.

At the present time the British (IPC) have refused to recognize the 50-50 "saving" or "profit" sharing principle as a basis for negotiation. As indicated above, Tapline has considered its agreements, which by their terms did not require ratification, binding and is making payments under their respective terms. The British IPC negotiators have sought to employ the Syria-Tapline Agreement as a basis for their negotiations with Syria, but Syria has replied that the Tapline Agreement could likewise be revised upward by renegotiation. Tapline is meanwhile operating on the theory that it has valid agreements with Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon, and is waiting out developments.

Comments on the proposal of IPC (attached) are contained in Despatch 5400, London, May 11, 1953 [3] as well as in Despatch 5362, London, May 8, 1953; [4] in Telegram 914, November 13, 1952, [5] Department to Beirut; and in A 987, January 19, 1953 [6] and A-869, December 12, 1952, Department to London. The Department has thus far not taken any position with the foreign governments concerned on the substantive issues involved, but the question has been mentioned by members of the British Embassy in Washington in informal conversations with us.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Herbert Liebhafsky of the Petroleum Policy Staff

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 9, 1953.[1]

Subject: Departmental Position on Problem of Furthering Iraq Petroleum Company Transit Negotiations with Syria and Lebanon.

Participants: Messrs. Robertson and Funkhouser—NEA
Mr. Winters—BPT
Mr. Metzger—L/E
Mr. Kirk—ED
Messrs. Eakens and Liebhafsky—PED

The meeting was called by Mr. Eakens to discuss the Department's position regarding the request of Mr. Charles P. Darlington, representing the Socony-Vacuum interest (11.375 per cent) in the Iraq Petroleum Company, that the Department support IPC's position in the forthcoming negotiations for pipeline transit agreements between the Company and the Governments of Lebanon and Syria. Copies of the IPC's negotiating proposals setting forth alternative formulae for computing the amount of payments to be made to each country for transit rights had been distributed in advance of the meeting.

Mr. Eakens opened the meeting by stating the problem briefly. He then called on each member in turn to set forth his views of what the Department's reply to Mr. Darlington (and the Department's position on the problem) ought to be.

Mr. Robertson stated that a discussion he had recently with Mr. Saba Habashi, Advisor to the Secretary General of the Arab League, revealed certain points which were pertinent to the present problem. This discussion indicated that the negotiations of Aramco with the Saudi Arabian Government presently underway were being carefully watched by the other members of the Arab League. The terms of the agreement finally negotiated by Aramco with Saudi Arabia would undoubtedly influence the views of the transit countries with respect to the pipeline agreements. Mr. Habashi had pointed out that there were limits on the dealings which private companies could have with sovereign governments. Although Aramco had done much to improve conditions at the grass roots level in Saudi Arabia, it had been opened to attack by the FTC Report. There is a need for a U.S. Government policy statement to counter the bad effects of this Report, which is looked upon as the official U.S. Government position in the area.

Mr. Robertson also pointed out that Aramco was the American company in the area, while IPC is a British company and is looked upon as essentially British even though there are some American interests in it. Consequently U.S. Government support, if any, might more properly be given to Aramco rather than IPC, which should look to the British for its main support.

On the whole, Mr. Robertson thought that in the light of these facts the United States ought to adopt a wait and see policy before actively supporting the current IPC negotiating proposals. He thought any action ought to be delayed at least until the Aramco negotiations are completed.

Mr. Metzger agreed generally with Mr. Robertson's views. He believed that the essential problem was one of timing. The IPC proposals were merely a basis for negotiating and the United States ought not to identify itself at this stage with a specific proposal which might not be accepted. He thought it would be best if any support which the U.S. Government might give the companies were reserved until the negotiations had developed and sharpened the differences, if any, between the two sides.

Mr. Eakens suggested that it could be argued that there was a disadvantage in waiting if the present IPC proposal were accepted and set a precedent. Since the proposal would probably not actually be accepted, this possible disadvantage probably would not materialize. He also believed that the main responsibility for assisting IPC should rest with the British with the U.S. giving appropriate support.

Mr. Kirk expressed his general agreement with the positions stated by Mr. Robertson and Mr. Metzger. He also pointed out that it would be unwise for the U.S. to agree to support the IPC's technical proposals without knowing the British reaction to these proposals.

Mr. Winters indicated his general agreement with the foregoing statements but pointed out that he believed the United States ought not to identify itself with any company in the Middle East at this time until the questions raised by the anti-trust action were resolved. Otherwise he felt the United States might find itself supporting the companies on the one hand, and bringing a legal action against them on the other. It would be difficult to argue abroad that the companies had always behaved in a favorable manner towards the countries concerned if at the same time a consent decree should be made in the pending civil anti-trust suit.

Mr. Funkhouser also agreed generally with the preceding statements. He thought there were several reasons for the Department delaying to intervene with Syria and Lebanon at this time: (1) The negotiations between Aramco and Saudi Arabia were not yet completed; (2) The Arab League was considering the whole problem; (3) Neither Syria nor Lebanon has decided its position on the transit question except that they both want more money; (4) Aramco had not yet disclosed its position to the Department; (5) Ambassador Malik of Lebanon was supposed to have been given carte blanche by his government to negotiate the matter with Aramco in the United States—if this was true there were several people with authority to negotiate and the lines of authority ought to be cleared up; and (6) We have not yet learned the British reaction to the IPC proposal which was submitted to the British Foreign Office in April.

After some further discussion of the question it was agreed that the Department would take the following actions on Mr. Darlington's request:

He would be told by Mr. Eakens that the Department does not believe it would be desirable from its standpoint or that of the American companies to identify itself with the specific formulae set forth in the IPC negotiating paper. Since the paper is a negotiating paper, IPC's position may well change substantially, or even completely, in the course of the negotiations. In view of the several unresolved but related problems, set out in Mr. Funkhouser's six points above, it would seem preferable that the U.S. Embassy not intervene in any way at this time. It would also seem desirable that IPC do its best in the negotiations to reach mutually acceptable agreements with Syria and Lebanon. If points should develop on which agreement cannot be reached, that would seem to be the best time for the Department to determine in what way it could best support the American interests involved. Since IPC is a British company, and since the American interest is a minority interest, it is considered that the primary responsibility for support of IPC should rest with the U.K., with the U.S. playing a supporting role.

If Mr. Darlington strongly feels that possible support on the foregoing basis would be completely ineffective, he would be told that the Department would consider informing the Syrian Government (with whom it is expected the negotiations will begin first) at the time the negotiations begin, and after the U.K. had taken the lead, that the U.S. Government considers the negotiations most important, that it will follow them with interest, and that it is hopeful that the parties will reach a mutually acceptable settlement which will enable the pipeline to operate effectively to the advantage of all parties concerned. A similar position would apply to Lebanon. (Most participants in the meeting believed that before telling Mr. Darlington exactly what the Department would be able to do, the Department's proposed line of action should be cleared with Justice.)

It was also agreed that with respect to the specific formulae contained in the IPC proposals, the Department would not make any formal or official comments or suggestions to IPC. Mr. Eakens would, however, after obtaining the comments of the other interested persons in the Department, transmit such comments to Mr. Darlington on a purely personal and informal basis and for such use as Socony might wish to make of them. These would take into account the comments of Mr. Moline, set forth in Despatch No. 5400, May 11, 1953 from London. [2]

Memorandum of Conversation, by Herbert Liebhafsky of the Petroleum Policy Staff

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 16, 1953. [1]

Subject: Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC) Paper for Pipe Line Transit Negotiations with Syria and Lebanon.

Participants: Mr. Charles Darlington, Socony Vacuum Overseas Supply Company
Mr. Funkhouser—NEA
Messrs. Eakens and Liebhafsky—PED

Mr. Darlington, representing the Socony Vacuum interest in the Iraq Petroleum Company, had requested the meeting to obtain the Department's reactions to certain negotiating proposals which IPC was considering with a view to presenting them to Syria and Lebanon as a basis for negotiating pipeline transit agreements with those countries.

Mr. Darlington stated at the outset that he believed the question of renegotiating the existing agreements was quiet at the moment and not likely to be reopened before autumn. He believed the transit countries were watching the current Aramco negotiations with Saudi Arabia, and that the results of those negotiations would serve as the basis of the demands of the transit companies upon IPC. He mentioned that IPC had given a copy of its negotiating paper to the British Foreign Office but had not yet obtained any reaction from the British. He then inquired whether Mr. Funkhouser had heard whether the Middle East oil questions had been discussed by the representatives of the Arab League at their Beirut meeting.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on June 18.

Mr. Funkhouser said he had heard oil had not been formally discussed, even though it was on the agenda. It may have been discussed informally among the Ministers. The Department did not yet know why the question had not been considered there.

Mr. Eakens then asked Mr. Darlington whether he did not believe that it would be wiser from the standpoint of both the United States and the companies for the United States not to identify itself specifically at this time with any of the negotiating proposals contained in the IPC paper.

Mr. Darlington agreed. He considered it most important, however, for the companies to keep the Department informed of the progress of negotiations and of their thinking in the matter in order that the Department would be in a position to support them if this became necessary at a later date. He believed that Aramco was making a great mistake in not keeping the Department informed of the progress of its negotiations with Saudi Arabia. He said that Aramco was primarily under the control of Caltex, and while Socony Vacuum held an interest this was only a minority interest.

There was some general discussion of the Aramco offer to the Saudi Arabian Government during which such information as the various parties had of these negotiations was mentioned. Mr. Darlington explained that the price under the McNaughton formula had been arrived at as a weighted average of Basra, Kuwait, Qatar, and Iraq oil prices, including long term contracts. The trouble with the McNaughton formula was that it was tied to tanker rates. McNaughton was a geologist who had been hired by the Saudi Arabian Government to assist it in determining oil prices.

Mr. Eakens questioned whether the price under any formula, such as the McNaughton formula, was not certain to give rise to future difficulties as long as the price under the formula differed from actual prices at which the companies sold Saudi Arabian oil to bona fide arm's-length purchasers. Mr. Darlington said that Mr. Jennings favored the use of actual prices in settling with Saudi Arabia except perhaps for a 10 per cent discount, but that his view had not prevailed.

Mr. Funkhouser said that there were various climates of opinion in the Saudi Arabian Government. The present Finance Minister was a conservative and appeared to have the interests of both the oil companies and Saudi Arabia at heart. He was moreover friendly to the United States. Some others were shortsighted and radical. It was hoped that American oil companies in the area would so conduct their negotiations as to assist in the development of the regions and also to support those elements of the Middle Eastern Governments which were friendly to the United States.

Mr. Eakens asked Mr. Darlington if he did not believe that since IPC was a British company with a minority American interest it was not up to the British Government to take the lead in such assistance as the company may need in negotiations with Syria and Lebanon, and for the United States to play a supporting role.

Mr. Darlington agreed completely. He also agreed the United States would have to play a primary role with regard to Aramco, which was an American company, if this became necessary.

Mr. Eakens and Mr. Funkhouser then commented in detail on the IPC negotiating proposals for Mr. Darlington's benefit, it being understood by all parties that the comments were informal, personal, and in no sense represented the official position of the Department. The comments were discussed and Mr. Darlington expressed appreciation for the work which had been done in making them available to him. Mr. Darlington agreed that he would use the comments only as points that he had developed in studying the problem, and that he would not attribute them to the Department. He indicated that he might use the points as a means of stimulating thinking in regard to the pipe line transit problem. A copy of these informal comments is attached. [2]

In conclusion, Mr. Darlington said he appreciated the opportunity to discuss these questions with Department officials and hoped in the future to keep them informed of developments in the negotiations between IPC and the transit countries.

[2] The comments, which were not generally favorable to the majority of the IPC negotiating positions are not printed. One section mentioned the fact that the pipelines, by negotiating privileged tax-free positions for themselves, had made themselves vulnerable to discriminatory pressures in the Middle East. The paper also suggested that IPC had no convincing explanation for rejecting a 50/50 division of the profits for pipeline transit as well as for production, especially since the U.S. Government tax of 52 percent after the depletion allowance applied to pipelines.

Subject: Middle East Oil Situation

Participants: The Under Secretary
Mr. J.T. Duce, Vice President, Arabian-American Oil Company
Mr. Saba Habashi, Egyptian Lawyer retained by Aramco
Mr. George Ray—General Counsel—Aramco
NE—Mr. Funkhouser

Mr. Habashi stated (a) the Petroleum Committee of the Arab League had been revived after a five-year period of inactivity, (b) on May 25, 1953, the Ministers of Finance of the Arab states had engaged in discussions on Middle East oil prices, (c) oil price talks between Iraqi and Saudi Arabian officials had taken place recently in Riyadh, (d) the Petroleum Committee planned to convene at an early date to discuss a "minimum price of oil" and a "collective position on oil pricing".

Mr. Habashi discussed in general terms: (a) the increasing trend in the Middle East towards "gradual" nationalization, (b) the injurious effect in the area of the FTC report and anti-trust action, (c) the importance of United States Government support for progressive elements and individuals in the area, particularly the Arab League, (d) the danger that the extremist elements (Communists, xenophobes and "the greedy") would gain the upper hand.

The Under Secretary inquired if Mr. Habashi considered these trends "unexpected", stated that previous information given the Department generally confirmed Mr. Habashi's conclusions, and requested Mr. Habashi's views on "what to do about it".

Mr. Habashi suggested in general terms more positive United States Government official or moral support for the oil companies and for those local leaders who were working towards goals desired by the United States. He mentioned further diplomatic, economic and technical assistance in forms which could have beneficial effects on the oil situation. He specifically asked if "status" could be given to the Arab League, which was now under the progressive leadership of Hassouna, or if a United States diplomatic representative could be accredited to the League.

The Under Secretary pointed out that there would be overriding difficulties for the United States in either of the suggested actions. It was, however, stated that the Department would examine the general problem closely, since it wished to encourage in every appropriate way constructive efforts of such regional organizations.

With respect to Mr. Habashi's statements that Middle East states were now preparing to work closely together on oil problems, the Under Secretary stated that the United States had in the past supported such cooperative economic efforts and gave as an example the Coal and Steel Community in Europe. He expressed the view that a "Petroleum Community" in the Middle East might not only be an inevitable long-term development, but conceivably a useful one. The United States Government might under those circumstances, as it had in Europe, provide special assistance and official recognition to such a body. The vast proven oil reserves of the Middle East would present a rather substantial base for any United States Government loan to such an organization. The Under Secretary expressed the view that such a "community", if developed along constructive lines from the beginning, could conceivably be profitable to both the countries and companies concerned; it would also have to take into full account the interests of world oil consumers as well.

Regarding Mr. Habashi's observance of nationalization trends, the Under Secretary stated that unfortunately "natural resources invite nationalization", that states appear to be moving towards "increasing control of sources of wealth within their own boundaries", and expressed his belief that industry leaders should, as military commanders, allow for "the unfavorable" in their planning. He expressed the view that "management contracts" might evolve as the pattern of future development in oil producing countries.

With respect to the FTC report and anti-trust legislation, the Under Secretary generally referred to positions and actions taken by the Department of State. He stated that the Department, however, "had to operate within the limits of the possible" and that "anything further" was "unattainable".

Other points touched on were: (a) the question of United States technical assistance to the Arab League Petroleum Committee, (b) the question of Point IV technical assistance on oil to local governments, (c) the possibility of Arab states agreeing on oil prices or other oil policies for the Middle East, (d) the effect of Iranian nationalization on surrounding areas.

There was insufficient time to examine critically the following points: (a) Mr. Ray's repeated statement that Aramco was now "thoroughly discredited" in Saudi Arabia, (b) Mr. Ray's tendency to equate oil company troubles in the Middle East simply to United States Government anti-trust action and the FTC report, (c) Mr. Habashi's implication that nationalization would ipso facto make Middle East oil unavailable, (d) the role of oil companies and of Near East officials in countering adverse trends in the Middle East oil situation, and (e) the technical obstacles which Middle East oil producing states would face when seeking agreement on price under varying conditions re distance from market, hard and soft currency transactions, varying costs and transportation charges, short and long-term contracts, Western hemisphere competition, etc.

The Under Secretary expressed his appreciation to Mr. Habashi for his sincerity of purpose and constructive efforts, indicated that there were limitations to what the State Department alone could do, referred to the attention which the Secretary was personally devoting to Middle East problems and to the virtual exhaustion of Secretary Byroade in this work, expressed the need for assistance from individuals and governments in the area directly concerned and stated that recommendations regarding specific lines of action would always be most welcome.

The Under Secretary was most warmly thanked.

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Lebanon–Syria–Iraq Affairs (Funkhouser) to the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Hart)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 3, 1953.[1]

Subject: Middle East Oil Policy Considerations

1. The history of agreements on Middle East oil is not encouraging. Past agreements have been either restrictive, counter-productive or ineffective:

(a) The Sam Remo agreement arbitrarily divided Middle East oil between the British and French. The United States Government spent several years breaking up this "duopoly", only to replace it by what even oil men consider an undesirable "oligopoly", e.g., IPC.

(b) The State Department's "Open Door Policy" negotiations with the British Government in the 1920's were officially interpreted as a landmark in improving the competitive aspects of Middle East oil development and in establishing U.S. oil companies in the Middle East. C. S. Gulbenkian, however, calls the "O.D.P." "eyewash", and writes in his memoirs that "never was the open door so hermetically sealed". "If the U.S. companies had not been allowed into the British-French Mesopotamian concession, they would have broken in", because of the tenuous and controversial grounds on which the British-French concession was based. Gulbenkian argues that this action established a most effective cartel in which maximum prices and profits were realized.

[1] Under the dateline on the source text is the notation: "(revised) September 10, 1953."

(c) The intercompany Red Line Agreement of 1926 prevented the major oil companies from competing against each other for concessions or oil purchases in the Middle East. This helped retard production in Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and the Neutral Zone for ten to twenty years. It contributed heavily to public mistrust of the international oil business which is haunting the oil industry today in the area.

(d) The Anglo-American Oil Agreement of 1946 was abortive. The United States Government with its companies controlling only 5% of Middle East production wanted to remove British restrictions to competition. The United Kingdom Government wanted an agreement which would maintain the status quo and guarantee respect for concession contracts. The eviscerated compromise was meaningless but even that caused domestic producers in the United States to fear that they might be subjected to some international control. The agreement was pocketed by Senator Connolly. Meanwhile, American companies by their own competitive efforts and without such an agreement have gained control of 66% of Middle East production. (This might be 90% if United States companies wished to deal with Iran.)

(e) United States Government efforts (1946–1948 and later) to spell out an oil policy have been abortive. The Department of State has not been able to agree on oil policy within its own walls, let alone develop substantive agreement between other agencies. Probably the major impasse comes down to whether the principles of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act are good or not good for the world and oil.

2. There are other reasons for this dilemma regarding agreement on oil. One is that there are few outside the oil industry who are well informed on oil; company officials by their nature cannot be completely disinterested and objective. Secondly, two realistic and resourceful oil executives when put together traditionally retreat to caution and conformity. These qualities are not helpful in accommodating the dynamic oil industry to the rapidly changing conditions in the Middle East. Thirdly, the Departments of the United States Government, as well as oil companies, seem to find it difficult to agree formally to the difficult courses of action always required. Formal discussions and agreements on oil turn out to be defensive and try to insulate the oil industry from trends abroad in the world. Nationalism as applied to the oil industry and interpreted by the industry becomes a scheme of local radicals who "wish to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs". Consequently, oil policy discussions tend towards the restrictive, the unrealistic and the unimaginative. Lastly, oil agreements seem always to be between parties that have the oil and consequently cannot take into account adequately the interests which cause the trouble. The result is that agreements on oil are suspect in the public mind and "agreements" become in themselves self-defeating. This would certainly apply to any US-UK agreement on Middle East oil at either the company or the government level.

3. It is thus more than possible that the results of United States and United Kingdom oil company collusion or cooperation, as HMG is recommending, would produce something bad rather than good. United States oil history and legislation would support this suggestion. The facts and findings of the FTC report, notwithstanding its highly slanted and non-objective approach, are pertinent in this respect. It should be remembered that the NSC and individual departments of government did not attempt to evaluate the substance of the report or its validity but only objected to its publication. Critical problems raised by real or alleged collusion among oil companies remain to be settled.

4. Oil companies are now insisting that the anti-trust lawsuit is the root of all their Middle East troubles. This point should be most carefully evaluated. While it is obvious that ME officials will take advantage of every available weapon in their negotiations, it is unrealistic to equate oil company difficulties in the area to the lawsuit alone. Oil companies were under greater pressure in the two-year period preceding the FTC report and lawsuit than they have been in the succeeding period, e.g. AIOC concession was cancelled in 1951; Aramco told the Department that American lives were endangered by Saudi Arabs in 1950, IPC narrowly escaped nationalization in 1949. A reflection of the deepseated problems discussed in the FTC report could be found in these serious crises, but neither the report itself nor the lawsuit played any role in these difficulties since they were unborn. Similarly, it was easy to predict, as both Department and oil company officials did on repeated occasions, that the pipeline and pricing policies of ME companies were most vulnerable to local attack on grounds of precedents elsewhere. Industry representatives recognized this situation, and current Aramco action squarely faces these facts. The anti-trust action has of course contributed to local suspicion of companies in the area, but this is neither particularly new nor is it certain that it is one of the basic contributing factors to instability in Middle East oil. Solutions aimed at removing what may be marginal factors in this equation may be either counter-productive domestically and abroad or dangerously tangential during a critical period when the real sources of trouble must be analyzed and corrected.

5. It is possible to be equally skeptical about constructive results from collusion or cooperation between Arab states on oil. Their self-interest lies not only in increased control of the industry with the attendant hazards to the West, but specifically in increased prices which could adversely affect the viability of all oil consuming states, particularly our European allies. Such repercussions would hardly cause concern among Arab Governments which feel the West has taken too much profit from Arab oil too long.

6. Collusion or cooperation between Arab states and oil companies together might well compound the disadvantages of paragraphs three and four. There might be a pronounced mutuality of interest in higher prices, supported by controlled or restricted production. Direct repercussions could increasingly with time affect the American consumer. With the center of gravity of the world's oil moving from the United States to the Middle East, matters of price and supply may eventually be determined in the Arab world and the unpleasant day may come when Arab states can double oil prices and get away with it.

7. Collusion or cooperation between oil companies, Arab states and HMG might further compound the problem. As British Embassy representatives have suggested, HMG's Treasury might welcome higher priced Middle East oil. A case could be made that the consumer would find himself up against a formidable "super-cartel". Competition in the international oil industry could under the circumstances suffer a serious blow. It is possible that big companies would get bigger, small companies smaller, fewer would control more, until the point of serious conflict with the rest of the world, the result of which could cause world repercussions much greater than anything now faced.

8. Mr. Duce believes that such a group, however, could get together for constructive purposes. He refers to the operations of the Texas Railway Commission which endeavors to conserve dwindling reserves and to avoid unsound production practices. It should be remembered, however, that the Commission was developed within the narrow limits of one area which had experience in producing oil in vast quantities for fifty years. The problem in the Middle East seems to be quite different. The Arabs are not interested in conservation. Their complaint is that their oil has been conserved too long. Their production has been restricted during a most lucrative half of the twentieth century and now they may well wish to spread their oil all over the world. Arab states may eventually be more concerned with competition from other sources of power than with depletion of their 70 billion barrels of proved resources which probably cannot be over-produced in the foreseeable future.

9. One of the tested solutions to oil problems has been, on the other hand, the development of conditions under which competitive forces are encouraged to operate more freely on each other. Some oil executives and economists, for example, believe that AIOC might never have been nationalized if they had had competitors in Iran. There is a certain safety in numbers; it has worked in the United States and in Venezuela. If Jersey, Socony or Shell and several independent groups of whatever nationality had been producing oil in Iran the following might have developed: (a) there would have been no monopoly, which is ideally easy to nationalize, (b) AIOC would have been kept on its toes and been abreast of changing conditions in the world, (c) Iran would have profited from greater production, greater activity and greater revenues, (d) AIOC would not have been blamed for everything that went wrong in Iran. The Department has in the past, as have individual oil company officials, urged IPC and Aramco to relinquish greater parts of their 400,000 square mile concessions in the Middle East, for this reason. The Department has been partially successful with IPC and a strong case can be made that the action has been helpful in reducing tensions in the area. AIOC, of course, helped save itself from expropriation in 1933 by giving back 400,000 of its 500,000 square miles monopoly, but then unfortunately did everything in its considerable power to keep out competitors. Aramco by its own admission could have avoided jumping to the 50-50 profit-sharing agreement if they had given up a large part of their concession in 1950, as asked by the Saudis and generally supported by the Department. This issue may be difficult for the company to sidetrack indefinitely.

10. However, oil company management, like HMG, too often appears to think time is on their side and with notable exceptions may take required action too late. Concession contracts like the British Empire, will continue to undergo "surprising" attacks and "crises" and, like the British Empire, probably cannot be protected by guns or governments but only by enlightened thought, understanding and compromise. Enlightened oil company policies, knowledge and application of public relations, government relations, labor relations practices proven effective elsewhere in the world, forthrightness (such as has not been overdone to date in the recent Aramco price and IPC pipeline negotiations), education and other specific lines of action spelled out in the Department's draft Middle East Policy paper dated September 10, 1948, would seem to provide companies with the best possibility of riding out these crises and changing with change.

11. However, with oil company policies as they have occasionally been in the past, with the Arab coming into his own with a vengeance, with the historic precedents for colonies to go through the nationalistic stage before arriving at the international approach required for Mr. Duce's Oil Plan, IPC and Aramco local producing operations may well be nationalized or at least "reversed" in time. The equation may be that the nationalization date equals X (time for present generation to develop Arab oil "experts"), plus Y (completion of the large investments and installations needed to produce in quantity), plus Z (a hard-headed bargaining position on the part of oil company management). Z is dangerous variable, Y is probably here, and X is moving along fast. Irresponsible Arab nationalism and distrust of Western governments and oil companies appear to be "constants" in this equation. General Smith told Mr. Duce virtually the same thing when he said "natural resources invite nationalization".

12. In this regard it may be a false conclusion to consider that the Iranian catastrophe will deter others from following suit. On the contrary, it might be argued that other Middle East states (a) strongly sympathize with what they consider a courageous defiance of the West, (b) now more clearly recognize the extent to which oil companies and Western governments can and will penalize an oil state by boycott and (c) will consequently move more carefully but more relentlessly towards breaking this "foreign control" of their countries and their resources. To think that the Arab masses will learn a lesson from the Iranian debacle may be unrealistic.

13. Oil companies and/or Western governments might consequently be making useful plans at this moment to handle such a situation should it develop despite all efforts to the contrary, i.e., how to carry on trade in the Middle East in a situation in which producing "concessions" are drastically altered. General Smith's "management contracts" proposals might well be given secret study by industry and/or government, but it is difficult to have confidence that such planning for the worst can be successfully undertaken, particularly en masse as Mr. Duce suggests.

14. Perhaps serious study would indicate that nationalization or "reversal" of all Middle East producing properties might not ipso facto mean doom as oil companies claim. It is possible that the same oil might be available to the same consumers and to the same oil companies in the same quantities. There would appear to be no real alternate sources of consumers or companies. A case might even be made that there would be fewer tensions in our relations with the Middle East and a more profitable and stable international oil industry if the companies worked through the reverse type of concession, i.e., the management contract advanced by General

Smith and advocated by such successful oil executives as Mr. Brantly of ECA and Texas. What are needed are oil men with the vision to be able to accommodate their thinking to changing oil conditions in unorthodox times and in an unorthodox area. (I am convinced the industry, not government, must lead in this.) That ability to accommodate is best developed under an environment of free competition rather than from efforts to "hold the line", which seldom succeed. The "hold the line", "big stick", "force", "British", "Kennan" school has however many supporters in and out of industry; its adherents increase with frustration, exasperation and crisis in the area. I can't believe it is the answer or that it will work in 1953 in Asia. Its record, as illustrated best by past AIOC-UK policy in the Middle East, is unenviable in terms of end results. Its contribution to the difficulties now found in the area seems large. Such a policy even appears commercially unsound, judging by the profitability of the American company approach to Middle East oil problems. Furthermore, the identification of foreign companies with their foreign governments has not helped British company stability in the area, while a case can be made that Aramco's independence of the U.S. Government was not only responsible for the granting of the Aramco concession in the first place but has been a carefully nurtured concept of the company in its present highly successful operations. UK-AIOC singleness of purpose only served to close both minds to the realities of the Iranian situation and resulted in the wrong answer. Such a policy has also helped convince Iranians that sovereign control of their own country is meaningless in the face of foreign government involvement in commercial affairs.

15. In several years, events in the area may be recognized as sufficiently serious to require the type of international study and cooperation recommended six years ago by John Loftus. It will be remembered that Mr. Loftus gave his speech in Pittsburgh suggesting that the international oil business might wish that they had an international forum where international order in the industry and international rules to protect their investments might be slowly developed. Mr. Loftus was rash enough to suggest that to be effective such an international instrumentality should give full representation to the consuming as well as producing nations. He was violently attacked by segments of the industry at that time; there are indications, however, that Sir William Fraser and others may be less violent on the subject now.

16. Meanwhile, the most practicable line of action remains, in my opinion, a full informal exchange of ideas between individual Departmental officials and individual oil company executives. This at least has worked on important occasions in the past:

(a) NEA representations in 1948 to individual officials of Jersey, Socony and the British and French Embassies in Washington successfully brought about the first royalty increase in the Middle East in 15 years. A strong case can be made that nationalization of IPC in Iraq was avoided by this "semi-official" approach.

(b) Informal Department representations to the US companies operating in the area (1947-1949) were instrumental in bringing about the relinquishment of a number of concessions, including the Kuwait Neutral Zone. A strong case can be made that by this action, stability in Middle East oil as well as competition in Middle East oil was increased.

(c) Informal exchange of views between Department representatives and Middle East oil company executives (1949-1950) played a significant role in the adoption in the Middle East of the Venezuelan profit-sharing agreement as well as other progressive company practices in Venezuela.

(d) Informal exchange of views between Department representatives and individual United States oil officials (1952-1953) played a role in the development of the new "tariff" approach of United States companies to Middle East pipeline problems.

17. It is meanwhile to be deplored that there seems to be an increasing tendency among modern-day oil executives to seek increased government control, involvement, and so-called "protection", instead of depending on their own competitive virility and survival powers. This present-day desire to protect the status quo in place of disrupting the status quo would seem to be a sign of old age in business and does not reflect the attitude of the aggressive leaders who won the concessions in the first instance. If this is true, such companies as IPC and Aramco may look forward to the ignominous end of the unversatile dinosaur family that sank in the mud when the weather changed.

18. A strong case can be made that increased government involvement and control is inevitable in international oil. It seems almost certain that Arab Governments will exercise increasing control, and the argument perhaps could be made that in view of this inevitability United States and United Kingdom Governments should get into the act in order to make such control as harmless as possible. However, it is hoped that this unfortunate alternative can be postponed, and that every effort will be made to fight government encroachment into the oil business. This can best be done by increasing the competitive environment in international oil and by forcing oil companies to develop their biceps by punching each other in the nose occasionally. They are getting along awfully well these days.

19. I would, therefore, reach the conclusion that any study of "proposed solutions" to Middle East oil problems include an evaluation of the following "muscle building techniques" which have produced beneficial results, both commercial and political, in the past:

(a) Aramco and IPC might be completely freed from control of parents and might sell to all comers as producing companies.

(b) Aramco and IPC might relinquish all concession areas not currently in production.

(c) Pipeline companies might be completely freed from control of producing companies and parents and become "common carriers" in competition with tankers.

(d) Middle East governments might be urged to favor bids on new areas by companies without Middle East production.

(e) Every encouragement might be given to independence to move Iranian oil.

(f) These examples of "nose-punching techniques" have each been suggested to me by industry (major company) officials.

20. Lastly, it is of critical importance to the success of any approach that oil men be handled most carefully and diplomatically. Oil officials seem overly sensitive to any indication that the industry isn't perfect. It may be necessary to "agree" with them before attempting to draw criticism of their own operations and possible solutions from them. It is probable that government officials start with two strikes in any objective discussion of oil problems. Emotion, pride, loyalty, suspicion make it difficult to penetrate to reason. Oil men tend to divide government people as either "for them" or "against them" and the initial adverse impression seems to get around fast and make solutions most difficult to reach.

Memorandum of Conversations, by the Ambassador in Saudi Arabia (Hare) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL JIDDA, [July 6, 1953.]

In the course of a courtesy call on Shaikh Abdullah Sulaiman, Minister of Finance, on June 29, I observed that I had been kept informed of recent developments regarding negotiations between Saudi Arabian and Aramco representatives regarding the matter of pricing, and I wished Shaikh Abdullah to know that, based upon my very thorough discussion of this subject with Aramco officials, I was convinced that they were eager to achieve a solution and were prepared to take any reasonable steps to reach a settlement. However, the matter under discussion was very complicated and depended on various considerations going beyond the normal scope of both Aramco and the Saudi Arabian Government. As a consequence it was to be expected that reaching an agreed solution would be time consuming and frustrating at times but I was convinced that with good will on both sides, and I was sure that Aramco had such good will, satisfactory settlement could eventually be reached.

[1] Despatch 4 from Jidda, July 6, transmitted the source text and the memorandum of conversation with the Deputy Foreign Minister, infra. According to the despatch, the talks had taken place during the Ambassador's recent visit to Riyadh, and Aramco representatives had been advised of their substance.

Shaikh Abdullah said that he was glad that I had mentioned the matter and that he would give a history of what had taken place. His story was essentially the same as that which I had previously been given by Aramco but with particular emphasis on the fact that he had endeavored to facilitate settlement by letting Americans deal with Americans, i.e., by having Messrs McNaughton and Blowers negotiate with Aramco, but they had failed and he had consequently decided to withdraw from the picture and turn the matter over to other authorities. That had been done and the result was that Aramco and the Government were now much further apart than they had been previously; especially than they had been in the period during which he himself had been negotiating when the matter had finally turned on whether Aramco would pay back taxes for 1951.

I expressed my appreciation for this account and added that there were certain general comments which I desired to make regarding the relationship between Aramco and the Saudi Arabian Government. If one were frank one would have to admit that prior to the coming of Aramco and exploitation of Saudi oil resources, Saudi Arabia had been little more than a geographical expression. Other countries of the area such as Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, etc., had experienced long periods of development in various fields of activity. They had communications, schools, hospitals, industries, roads, and the various other attributes of a normally modern state, but Saudi Arabia had had none of these. It had been an economic vacuum and, being so, had been a mere skeleton without flesh. All that had been changed by oil and Saudi Arabia was now in the process of building itself up to a position similar to that of its neighbors. Flesh was being put on the bone. Saudi Arabia was becoming strong but it had only become strong because of Aramco and Aramco in its turn had grown strong, too.

All this led, as I saw it, to the conclusion that, dependent as it is on a single source of income, a strong Aramco means a strong Saudi Arabia; a weak Aramco means a weak Saudi Arabia. And in this latter connection, I had been both surprised and somewhat concerned to note what had appeared to be a recent tendency in certain circles in the Saudi Arabian Government to treat Aramco as something to be attached rather than something to be supported. It was, of course, to be assumed that problems would arise from time to time where Aramco and the government might have different ideas but these were not serious if the two parties settled such differences in a spirit of cooperation. It was quite a different thing when a policy was followed of nagging at Aramco and seeming to want to weaken it. Such a policy could only end in hurting both the Government and Aramco and do no one any good.

Shaikh Abdullah replied that it was quite true that there had been a change in attitude toward Aramco and he thought it was very important since he agreed fully that a strong Aramco meant a strong Saudi Arabia. The trouble seemed to be that Aramco was resorting to undue haggling when clear-cut action was required. A case in point was the payment for services rendered by the Government on Tapline where Aramco had been bargaining with the Government for some time and the matter still remained unsettled. Also Aramco did not seem to appreciate the necessity of getting along with the Ministry of Finance which was the Ministry under whose jurisdiction it came. As a consequence many of its problems were being brought before other authorities and the situation was getting steadily more complicated and difficult.

I asked Shaikh Abdullah if he had any recommendations as to how this problem might be put right. He added he had two suggestions. The first one was that Aramco should quit quibbling and settle the Tapline payment question. The second was the matter of pricing. It was true that he had retired from participation in this matter but if Aramco were to tell him that they would include 1951 in their recent informal agreement which they had reached regarding 1952 and 1953, he would undertake to go to see Prince Faisal and endeavor to persuade him to accept such a solution, and he thought that he would have quite good prospects of being able to do so.

Shortly after this meeting I saw Floyd Ohliger, Vice President of Aramco, who was in Riyadh at the time and told him of my conversations. He was very appreciative and said that he would follow up the matter with his principals but that he thought it inadvisable to mention the matter to Shaikh Abdullah immediately since he had no firm directive. Later he told me that he had seen Shaikh Abdullah on other matters and that, although pricing had not come up, Shaikh Abdullah had been very friendly and that he (Ohliger) thought that my conversation with him might prove to be very useful. He said that Shaikh Abdullah had frankly admitted that he was personally responsible for certain restrictive measures being imposed on Aramco now but had said that he frankly thought that the whole Aramco–Saudi relationship at the present time was rather absurd and that both sides were acting like children. He felt that they should settle their differences in their mutual interest.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Saudi Arabia (Hare)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL JIDDA, [July 6, 1953.]

Following my final audience with the King on July 2, I met with Shaikh Yusuf Yassin in the office of the Political Secretariat to discuss several pending matters, one of which was Aramco.

I told Shaikh Yusuf that, as he knew, I never undertook to discuss specific subjects pending between Aramco and the Saudi Government. Such discussion I felt should be confined to the qualified representatives of both sides. However, before leaving Riyadh for the last time, there were certain general observations which I wished to make and I repeated the remarks which I had previously made to the Finance Minister to the effect that a strong Aramco meant a strong Saudi Arabia and a weakened Aramco a weakened Saudi Arabia. This did not mean by any means that Aramco–Saudi relations were a static thing; quite to the contrary, their relationship would obviously be subject to continual change as situations changed. What was important was that this change should take place within a concept of maintaining the strength of both parties. The Saudi Arabian Government could not build itself up at Aramco's expense; if it attempted to do so, it would be to its sorrow.

Furthermore, I was convinced that this concept was understood and subscribed to by Aramco. There would, of course, be differences from time to time between Aramco and the Saudi Government but such differences should not be taken as a measure of the basic relationship. For instance, I understood that the question of pricing was now very much to the fore and that agreement had not been reached despite protracted discussion. This was hardly surprising when one considered the complexity of the problem, which had ramifications going far beyond the normal scope of both parties. However, I had talked this matter over at length with Aramco officials and knew that they really wanted to reach a reasonable settlement, and I felt certain that, if the Saudi Government afforded an opportunity, the matter could be adjusted.

Finally, I wished to say a word about the so-called F.T.C. report alleging monopolistic practices by oil companies and I desired to make it clear, as Secretary Dulles had stated here, that this report was as drafted in a special political atmosphere and that it by no means reflected the views of the present administration regarding Aramco. Not only that but it had not even had official endorsement by the previous administration. This should be clearly understood since it would be a great mistake to assume that Aramco was regarded other than most favorably by the American Government.

Shaikh Yusuf, who by this time had been joined by Khalid Gargoni, said he was glad I had mentioned this before departing. He wished to make it clear that he fully appreciated how much Saudi Arabia was indebted to Aramco for providing the means to develop the country and he realized that a strong Saudi Arabia depended on a strong Aramco. However, he could not understand (Khalid Bey joined in with vigorous support at this point) how Aramco could expect the Saudi Government to consent to its giving a 20% discount to its parent companies. If such a practice were brought up before a court it would merit a judgment of robbery. But this situation would no longer be tolerated. The Minister of Economy of Iraq had recently been here and the Saudis and Iraqis had compared notes and found that, whereas Aramco was citing IPC as a competitive reason for not yielding, IPC was giving the Iraqi Government the same story and citing Aramco. As a consequence, the Saudi and Iraqi Governments had decided that this practice must stop and they also intended approaching the Governments of Kuwait and Qatar to elicit their cooperation.

Furthermore, the attitude of the Aramco representatives had been abrupt and discourteous in their negotiations. They did not seem to understand where their best interests lay.

I replied that, as I had stated before, I would not attempt to debate the pricing question but, regarding the negotiating atmosphere and attitudes, it was interesting to hear the same events described in apparent sincerity by both sides in such different terms. I was certain that I knew what was in the minds of the Aramco negotiators and that no offense was intended. In so saying, I was not just trying to defend Aramco, although as Ambassador I was naturally very much interested in the welfare of such an important American enterprise; I was also thinking of the welfare of Saudi Arabia itself. As the time for my departure from Saudi Arabia neared, I hoped that I could feel that this matter would be settled in a broad and constructive spirit.

Shaikh Yusuf replied that I could rest assured on that score and he was certain that Saudi Arabia would reciprocate any good-will shown by Aramco—a statement which, knowing Shaikh Yusuf, I interpreted to mean that such good-will could be shown by full compliance with Saudi demands. However, I feel that the conversation did serve a useful purpose and, on the whole, Shaikh Yusuf's attitude was considerably more frank than in normal discussion with him. Furthermore, I have found in the past that such conversations with him are usually made the subject of quite accurate record for the information of the King, Crown Prince and others of the Saudi hierarchy.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Lebanon [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 8, 1953.

A-6. Re Beirut tele 23 July 7. [2] FYI only. Telegram from Duce to C.A. Swigert of Tapline in Beirut dated June 26 follows:

"1. In conference with Malik he states that Chamoun asked him when he was in Lebanon to initiate negotiations within the US for revision of present contract.

"2. Malik explained he had now received papers and was now prepared: (a) discuss this with proper people in Tapline and that Chamoun had explained he did not want to do anything that would appear to be anti-business and, particularly, anti-Western; (b) that Malik was also instructed seek assistance of U.S. Government in negotiations if necessary.

"3. Malik reports that Chamoun was anxious to get matter out of political atmosphere of Beirut, where negotiations were subject to political gossip and undesirable influences.

"4. Chamoun was anxious to complete negotiations before the September meeting of parliament, when he would present a contract for ratification in early days of meeting when ratification is easier.

"5. Malik further stated that he sought my advice as to whether he should send a formal letter to Tapline and take the matter up formally with the U.S. Government. He assured me he was most

[2] Not printed. Swigert informed the Embassy he had told President Chamoun that Tapline's willingness to discuss matters did not mean the company was prepared to consider revising the existing agreement, and the Lebanese request for the U.S. Government to take an active part in discussions between the company and a foreign government was inconsistent with U.S. policy in such matters. The Embassy agreed the company's relations with Lebanon did not require interest beyond that already manifested. (883A.2553/7-753) anxious not to have matter of contract become subject of political contention.

"6. I replied that I appreciated his approach to matter and that I would communicate with you promptly suggesting that I would have your reply as to procedure by Monday. I added that I knew little myself about the economics of pipeline and/or the present status of our contract but that I understood Tapline was making regular payments under the contract negotiated last year. I suggested for the present I refrain from contacting you or the U.S. Government or sending a formal letter to Tapline; that I was not empowered to act for Tapline in such matters with the Lebanese Government, that if any negotiations were to take place here, it would probably mean your return from Lebanon.

"7. I reminded Malik that Tapline were transient agencies competitive with tankers and that their economics were complicated by numerous problems. I added that we were presently leaving business to tankers as shown by shutbacks this month.

"8. May I suggest that direct private discussion between you and Chamoun alone seem indicated. Please advise what I should report to Malik."

Duce reported July 7 (a) Swigert disapproves informal Malik-company talks in U.S.; (b) Malik informed and stated he had no other course but to send formal letter to company. US Government participation has not been solicited by either party.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 25, 1953.

Subject: British Interest in Aramco-Saudi Price Negotiations

Participants: Mr. Harold Beeley, British Embassy
NEA: Mr. Jernegan

Mr. Beeley said the British Government had received information that the Aramco Board of Directors was divided regarding the position it should adopt toward Saudi demands in the present dispute over the prices on the basis of which tax payments to the Saudi Government should be calculated. It seemed that one group on the Board was disposed to make substantial concessions.

[1] This memorandum of conversation was attached to a memorandum by Jernegan to O'Connor, dated July 25, informing him the British Embassy, following instructions from the Foreign Office, requested that the information be brought to the personal attention of the Secretary of State. A handwritten note by O'Connor on the bottom of the memorandum noted that the Secretary had seen the memorandum of conversation on July 29.

The British Government was concerned lest undue concessions by Aramco should lead to new demands by the Iraqi Government against IPC and by Kuwait against the companies there. This concern was accentuated by the fact that Iraqi representatives had recently visited Saudi Arabia to advise the Saudis on their attitude toward Aramco and it could, therefore, be assumed that the Iraqis would be fully aware of any concessions the company might make. It was hoped that the Department would advise Aramco not to go too far. The Foreign Office expressly asked that its interest in this matter be brought to the personal attention of the Secretary of State.

I told Mr. Beeley that I did not know exactly where matters stood at the moment between the Company and the Saudis, nor was I sure how well the Company kept us informed of its intentions in these matters. I pointed out that Aramco had consistently attempted to maintain a position independent of the United States Government and that this had probably been an advantage to it in its relations with the Saudis. However, without making any commitment I said that I would look further into the situation and try to let Mr Beeley know our views or any information we might have next Monday. I asked Mr. Beeley whether IPC and the Kuwait Company had arrangements with the respective local governments of the same sort as those now in effect between Aramco and Saudi Arabia. He said he understood this was the case and that therefore any concessions regarding price made by Aramco could be directly related to the existing price arrangements in the other countries. He said that IPC was especially worried about the Saudi claims for retroactive price adjustments. I pointed out that at the most, these claims went back only to the date of signing of the present so-called fifty-fifty understanding in Saudi Arabia and that that arose because there had been no agreement as to prices at the time that understanding went into effect. Consequently, if IPC had a firm price understanding, it would not necessarily be affected by Aramco's action in now, for the first time, coming to agreement with the Saudis on this subject. Mr. Beeley replied that he was not entirely clear as to the basis of IPC fears, but he was sure that that Company was afraid of being hit with demands for retroactive payments.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of Lebanon-Syria-Iraq Affairs (Funkhouser)

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 28, 1953.

Subject: Aramco Negotiation Plans

Participants: Mr. James Terry Duce, Vice President, Aramco
Mr. A. Chapman, Washington Representative, Aramco
NEA—Mr. Jernegan
NE—Mr. A.D. Fritzlan
NE—Mr. Funkhouser

Mr. Jernegan stated that Mr. Beeley, Counselor of the British Embassy, had expressed his Government's concern that Aramco in its oil negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government might seriously disturb existing contractual relations in Iraq and Kuwait. Mr. Jernegan added that he had replied to Mr. Beeley that he would discuss this matter with representatives of Aramco. It was for this purpose that he had asked Mr. Duce to visit the Department.

The subsequent discussion with Mr. Duce brought out the following points:

1. Aramco will shortly present the Saudi Arabian Government with a new approach to both price and pipeline problems. The Iraq Petroleum Company and Kuwait Oil Company as well as all Middle East producing and pipeline transit countries will be substantially affected by the recent decisions of the Aramco Board of Directors.

2. Aramco is prepared to offer to share profits on the basis of posted or "world" prices, now $1.97 per barrel FOB Ras Tanura. This price represents an increase of $0.54/bbl. over the present value of Arabian crude. Aramco and SAG will thus each earn a $0.27/bbl. increase over the present $0.56/bbl. share of profits (approximately). This 50 percent increase in income will give SAG a total of approximately $220 million per year at the current production rate.

3. The impact on Kuwait Oil Company and particularly the Iraq Petroleum Company can be immediate and profound. It is apparent that demands for equal treatment will be made by the Iraq and Kuwait Governments. Iraq and Saudi Governments are now exchanging information on oil prices. Reports indicate that both are demanding "world prices" for their oil in place of the intercompany 20 percent discount price which has formed the basis for past and present profit-sharing in both countries. They also intend to get the support of the Sheikhs of Kuwait and Qatar on this issue. Furthermore, the IPC agreement with the Iraq Government recognizes that Iraq can reopen discussions if a neighboring country receives more favorable terms.

4. The Kuwait 50/50 agreement is based currently on actual contract sales price. It is believed that half the oil moves at a discount (current Aramco and IPC basis) and the other half at posted prices (new Aramco offer). Pressure from Kuwait for increased prices can be expected to follow developments in Saudi Arabia and Iraq. (Under these conditions Iraq and Kuwait annual oil revenues could reasonably be expected to move from approximately $120 million (in Iraq pounds) and $160 million (in Indian rupees) respectively to the neighborhood of $180 million and $200 million respectively at present production rates.)

5. The basis for this drastically revised position of the Aramco board was not discussed in detail. Mr. Duce, however, stated that "it was foolish to think that when the Venezuela 50/50 agreement was signed in 1945 it would not be taken over by Middle East countries." The pending Aramco offer brings the Saudi Arabian agreement closer to the long-existing Venezuelan model. Venezuela shares profits with the companies on posted or world prices rather than on an intercompany discount price; Venezuelan prices reflect changes in the world market which Aramco prices did not. It was apparent that Aramco considered it in their best interest to give the Saudi Arabian Government the full value of their oil as reflected by world price conditions and as demanded by Saudi negotiators. This value has recently gone up in the Western Hemisphere and the new increase is also to be given to the SAG.

6. Aramco will keep 50 percent of this increased crude profit. The "parent" companies which purchase the entire output will lose this profit. The parents of Aramco will thus transfer a slice of profit from the refining and marketing branches to the producing branch. (Taxes paid the United States Government by the parents will thus be increasingly transferred to the SAG as in the original 50/50 agreement. It would appear that as in the case of the original 50/50 agreement, Aramco has found a means of increasing payments to the SAG at no extra cost to the company. A study of the United States and SAG tax details might even indicate that the company under certain circumstances would realize a net financial gain by their action.)

7. Since no price agreement was signed in 1950 when the Aramco-SAG 50/50 agreement went into effect, SAG negotiators have been demanding that any increased price be paid retroactive-

ly. The posted price since 1950 has been $1.75/bbl or $0.32 above the $1.43 company price. Retroactive payments, if forced from Aramco in the negotiations would thus result in an additional lump sum payment to SAG of over $100 million. (The difference between the $1.75 and the $1.97 price represents the recent increase in world oil prices.)

8. Plans to sever completely Tapline pipeline operations from the Arabian-American Oil Company will be finalized and presented to SAG. An "independent" pipeline company will probably be established; the "tariff" principle used in the United States will probably be applied to the Middle East operations; pipeline profits, which will be declared and will reflect tanker competition, will probably be shared 50/50 with the transit states. (Mr. Duce spoke of a $0.40/bbl charge or tariff for transporting oil from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean. Given costs of approximately $0.25 a barrel Lebanon, Jordan, Syria and Saudi Arabia would thus share approximately $8 million per year; Lebanon, Syria, Jordan now share approximately $3 million per year from Tapline.)

9. Mr. Duce emphasized that secrecy was essential until such time as the company negotiators presented these new offers to the SAG. He specifically asked that the information "not leave the country". However, it was apparent that IPC could realistically be expected to learn of these developments from parent companies which IPC held in common with Aramco. The United Kingdom Foreign Office would consequently soon be informed. Mr. Jernegan mentioned that it was on a basis of such IPC representations to the Foreign Office that Mr. Beeley had expressed his concern to the Department. Mr. Duce stated that Mr. Davies, Chairman of the Aramco Board, was now in London and would discuss the general problem with Mr. Gibson, IPC Managing Director. [1]

10. Mr. Jernegan stated that in response to the company's request for absolute secrecy he would inform Mr. Beeley that (a) the Department wished to follow its general policy of resisting involvement or advice to industry upon matters primarily commercial in nature such as oil price negotiations between Aramco and the SAG but (b) the Department had expressed HMG and IPC concern to Mr. Duce who promised to convey it to top officials of the company. Mr. Duce later informed the Department of his intention to contact Mr. Beeley directly and undertake a general discussion of the

---

[1] Later that afternoon Jernegan met with Beeley. He told him the President of Aramco was in London and was expected to talk to the Managing Director of the IPC, who would probably pass the information on to the British Foreign Office. (Memorandum of conversation, July 28, 1953; 886A.2553/7-2853)

Aramco position. The Department representatives encouraged this approach.

Other points discussed included the following:

(a) A strong reaction from the British Government and/or British companies could be anticipated in view of the British tendency to go further in resisting increased payments to producing states in the Middle East and the added financial complications which would affect the sterling area. This drastic Aramco action also comes at a time when HMG has been pressing most strongly for coordinated United States-United Kingdom policy on Middle East oil.

(b) The timing of the Aramco approach would be as follows: Mr. Davies was expected in Saudi Arabia this week. He would immediately make known to Saudi authorities that he was prepared to resume negotiations. Negotiations would probably start after the Haj or approximately the first week of September. Details of the new pipeline approach would be worked out in the area in September by Messrs. H. Britten and J. Noble of Tapline.

(c) The new Aramco price offer would not break or alter existing agreements in Arabia. No agreement on price was ever reached between Aramco and Saudi Arabia authorities when the 50/50 profit-sharing agreement was signed. Aramco arbitrarily picked a $1.43 as the price basis for profit-sharing. The IPC agreement was patterned after this 20 percent discount off world prices. However, the Iraq Government in the Iraq-IPC negotiations formally agreed to this price.

(d) It was apparent since 1950 that Aramco was vulnerable on this price issue. By failing to reach agreement on price in 1950 Aramco was similarily vulnerable to demands for retroactive payments. The same would not seem to apply to the IPC case in view of the IPC-Iraq agreement, although in practice such demands for retroactive payments may be difficult to resist if paid to Saudi Arabia. There are, furthermore, ample precedents for retroactive payments in the area; the original Iraq and Saudi Arabia 50/50 agreements were retroactive one year and a year and a half respectively (to January 1950 in Saudi Arabia and January 1951 in Iraq). As mentioned above the precedents for establishing prices on a posted or world price basis already existed in the Western Hemisphere and Kuwait.

(e) According to the Department's information the original Saudi price demand was (a) to raise the crude price from a $1.43 to a $1.49 and (b) pay this retroactively to January 1951. This new price of $1.49 was based on advice given the SAG by an American firm headed by Mr. McNaughton. Aramco originally considered this demand exorbitant, refused and was subsequently subjected to demands for an oil price of (a) $1.91 for the future, (b) a price of a $1.75 retroactive to January 1950, and (c) a certain increase in price to reflect the increased value of oil as it moves toward the Mediterranean through the pipeline. The present Aramco offer would appear to go further than Saudi Arabian Government demands, except that the company hopes to avoid the retroactive payments.

(f) Mr. Duce stated that there was currently a surplus of oil in the industry and that certain of the companies were not in favor of the recent price rise. With regard to Arab acceptance of any downward price movement in oil, Mr. Duce stated that on a basis of his company's study of oil demand over the next 25 years (Paley Commission Report) the company was confident that it could maintain expanding and healthy operations.

(g) There was considerable discussion of the SAG's ability to spend these additional revenues. Mr. Duce stated that the company had no illusions in this respect nor did he feel it was their "business". He referred briefly to precedents in "Texas" regarding lavish expenditures. Reference was also made to precedents in Venezuela where annual oil income is now five time greater than Saudi Arabia's while area and population are considerably smaller.

(h) Regarding the possibility that the increased Persian Gulf price might bring Iranian oil into the market, Mr. Duce did not express concern but stated that he "always had held the position that a solution to the Iranian oil question was essential to the health of the industry."

(i) Mr. Duce stated that the intercompany oil price had been originally placed at the discount level ($1.43) primarily in order to provide the parents with the investment capital needed to develop the postwar refining and distribution end of business abroad. Now that this expansion in world-wide refinery and distribution capacity had taken place there was less need for the extra profit to be directed at that part of the business.

(j) When questioned regarding articles published in the area to the effect that cheap tanker rates were making the pipelines unprofitable, Mr. Duce stated "that must have been a planted article" and added "by someone other than us". He intended to diminish the proposition that the Middle East pipelines would lose business to tankers except under certain conditions principally involving currency and nonconcessionary companies.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1953.

Subject: British Interest in Aramco-Saudi Price Negotiations

Participants: Mr. Harold Beeley, British Embassy
NEA: Mr. Jernegan

Mr. Beeley said a telegram just received from the Foreign Office expressed disappointment at the attitude of the State Department, which I had conveyed to him in our previous conversations on this subject. The Foreign Office felt that repercussions of unwise action by Aramco could be very serious. Mr. Beeley did not go into details of the Foreign Office cmmunication but it was obvious from his remarks that the British Government felt we should take a more positive attitude vis-à-vis Aramco in advising against concessions.

I said I was not surprised that the Foreign Office was disappointed. I did not see, however, how we could change our general position of not giving advice on matters affecting price. Our general philosophy, as I understood it, was that the oil companies should fight their own battles and make concessions where they had to. If they did not give ground from time to time, they would in the long run wind up in a still worse position. In the present instance, the question at issue was how much the companies would have to pay for their stock in trade, which was exactly the kind of question that confronted any private business anywhere. It was difficult for me to become greatly excited over the predicament of a company, and merely a subsidiary company at that, which was making a net profit in the order of $150,000,000 a year.

The matter would be quite different, I said, if the companies were threatened with losing their properties or if they were being squeezed to the point where their operations would be no longer profitable.

Mr. Beeley did not directly answer my observations but said what the British Government wanted was some collaboration among the different companies in the area so that they could present a united front to Arab demands. He realized that the American companies were reluctant to do this because of our anti-trust laws but wondered whether the same end could not be accomplished through governmental channels.

I pointed out that in the present case Aramco was now informed of the attitude of the British Government and IPC and that furthermore the President of Aramco, Mr. Davies, was to have talked with the Managing Director of IPC, Mr. Gibson, in London this week. So far as the information was concerned, I felt all that was really necessary had been done. [1] If Aramco wished to take a stand with the other companies it was in a position to do so. I thought governmental agencies could be used to a certain limited extent, as in this case, for the transmission of information. We could, at least, advise the American companies of the views of the British Government and we could add our own observations if we felt it proper. . . .

[1] In telegram 489 from London, July 31, the Embassy reported the Foreign Office was concerned about developments in the Aramco–Saudi Arabian negotiations and requested some information on the matter from the Department of State. Telegram 597 to London, Aug. 3, informed the Embassy of conversations held in the Department with officers of the British Embassy and Aramco officials. (886.2553/7–3153)

Mr. Beeley observed in passing that the Iraqi Government had given notice to IPC that it wished to reopen negotiations on prices. As a sidelight, he mentioned that the note given the Company in this connection had had typed on the bottom "copy to Saudi Arabian Legation".

I remarked that if the Iraqis were already opening this question with IPC, it would seem to be less important that Aramco was involved in the same kind of discussion with Saudi Arabia. Mr. Beeley said IPC intended to refuse to reopen the price question; if Aramco made substantial concessions the IPC position would be greatly weakened.

Memorandum of Conversations, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 5, 1953.

Subject: New Attitude of Arab States Toward Foreign Oil Companies

Participants: Mr. R.G. Follis, Chairman of the Board of Standard Oil Company of California
NEA: Mr. Jernegan

Mr. Follis said that his Company was deeply concerned about recent trends in the attitudes of the Arab States, specifically Saudi Arabia, toward the foreign oil companies operating in the region. He believed the action of the United States Government in bringing an anti-trust suit against the companies had caused the Arabs to look at the companies in a new light. Whereas formerly they had treated them as more or less ordinary commercial enterprises, they now tended to think of the companies as a powerful cartel which conspired to rig all petroleum matters in its own interest and threatened the sovereignty of the producing states. The Arabs took the line that if the United States Government itself made charges against the American companies, these charges must be true and the Arabs were therefore fully justified in taking any action, even including nationalization, necessary to protect their interests against this nefarious combine of economic imperialists.

Aramco, Mr. Follis said, was accustomed to being criticized by one group in Saudi Arabia which had always been hostile, but it was greatly worried by the fact that those who had in the past been its friends were now turning away and saying that they could no longer support the company in the face of the statements and actions of the American Government. He referred particularly to the Federal Trade Commission report and the anti-trust suit. He pointed out that the Arabs did not distinguish in their minds between a criminal suit and a civil suit and in any case were not interested in the punishment or lack of punishment of offenders against the laws of the United States but rather in the evidence produced by the United States to show that its own companies had been conducting themselves improperly.

To correct this situation, Mr. Follis thought the ideal would be a cancellation of the anti-trust suit. He recognized, however, that this was probably politically impossible for the Administration. It was, nevertheless, essential that the United States Government do something, he could not suggest what, to reestablish the credit of the companies in Arab eyes and minimize, if not eliminate, the impression that a cartel in fact existed.

In addition to the new critical attitude of the Arabs toward the companies, Mr. Follis emphasized the danger presented by the new Arab tactic of consulting together to form a united front against the companies. Whereas in the past each Arab state was probably deterred from pushing matters too far because the companies could, as in the case of Iran, make up production losses in one country by increasing production in another, they were now beginning to realize, he feared, that if they all acted together they could exert tremendous pressure. The West simply could not afford to lose the whole of Near Eastern production.

Aramco was about to embark on a new series of negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government with regard to prices and, for the first time in the history of the concession, the Company was not confident of its ability to reach a reasonably satisfactory agreement. Even if agreement were reached, it was not confident that this would settle anything. It was quite likely that the Saudis would soon come forward with further demands.

This general picture led Mr. Follis to believe that in the future it was going to be necessary for the American Government to take a very active role in the Near Eastern oil situation and give more direct support to the oil companies operating in that region. I observed that I was sorry to hear him say that, not because the American Government would hesitate to defend the interests of American enterprises but because at the present time it was extremely difficult to give effective support in this kind of a problem.

With regard to the problem of restoring the credit of the oil companies in the minds of the Arabs, I said I appreciated the problem and that we would continue to give it attention but I did not see clearly what we could do.

Regarding the danger of a united Arab front and nationalization of oil holdings, I said we knew that the Arabs were in fact consulting together more closely than in the past but I had seen little or no indication of an immediate danger of nationalization in any of the Arab States.

Mr. Follis brought up the Iranian case and observed that he thought it was probably fortunate that no settlement had yet been made. If a settlement had been achieved on the basis of proposals previously put forward, he feared it would have wide-spread repercussions in the other producing countries. This was not because of the competitive effects of a reintroduction of Iranian oil into the world market but rather because the Arab States would see that Iran had successfully nationalized and still been able to make a profit from its oil resources. I suggested that the safeguard against this type of danger might be for the companies to so conduct themselves that the Arabs would see that they were getting greater benefits from the present type of arrangement than Iran could attain from taking over its own industry. I pointed out that it was most improbable that any sort of Iranian settlement would enable Iran to get profits equal to those now being received by the Arabs. Mr. Follis agreed this was the case so long as each country was acting by itself, but if they joined together in a common front against the supposed oil cartel they would then consider themselves able to exact whatever terms they liked and make it impossible for any one of them to be shut out of the world market. The Iranian example would serve as a deterrent only so long as the Arabs considered the companies might be able to make up a deficit in one country by increasing production elsewhere. As he had pointed out previously, this would not be the case if all Near Eastern producers were banded together.

In a conversation later today with the Acting Secretary, Mr. Waugh and Mr. Jernegan, Mr. Follis took the same line. General Smith expressed his complete understanding of the situation and his regret that the Federal Trade Commission report and anti-trust suit had produced the present state of affairs. He said that the Department of State, and he himself when he was head of CIA had foreseen these dangers and pointed them out at the time the decision was made to release the FTC report and institute the suit. He was afraid that the effect had been even worse than anticipated. The problem, however, was what to do about it. It would be almost, if not entirely, impossible for the President to call off the suit since that would involve over-riding the judgment of competent lawyers in the Department of Justice that there had in fact been violations of the anti-trust laws. Mr. Follis said he fully understood this. He wondered, however, if it would not be possible to conduct the case with a view to producing a minimum of unfortunate repercussions. Both General Smith and Mr. Waugh expressed great doubt that adverse publicity could be avoided once the case came to trial.

In the course of the conversation reference was made to the suggestion advanced last year that a governmental commission be set up to study the whole international oil picture with a view to substituting some form of continuing governmental control for the present anti-trust proceedings with regard to operations in the foreign field. General Smith said he would be glad to consider this suggestion. He would be willing to talk with Attorney General Brownell about this or any other procedure which would be politically possible and would get us out of our present dilemma. However, he would have to have some sort of definite proposal to make and he asked Mr. Waugh and Mr. Jernegan to make a study with this end in view.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 17, 1953.

Subject: Middle East Oil

Participants: Robert H. Scott, British Minister
The Acting Secretary, W. Bedell Smith
NEA: Mr. Jernegan

Mr. Scott said that his Government was greatly concerned over the Middle East oil picture and wished to propose that informal talks be initiated on the subject between representatives of the British Embassy in Washington and appropriate officers of the Department. He suggested that Mr. Harold Beeley, Counselor of the Embassy, would be designated on the British side and that Assistant Secretary Byroade would seem to be an appropriate officer on the American side.

General Smith observed that he fully shared the British Government's concern over the oil picture in the Middle East and that he saw no objection to the proposed talks. Our Officers were always at the disposal of the Embassy for discussion on any subject. He agreed that Mr. Byroade was the indicated Officer in this case.

General Smith and Mr. Jernegan both remarked, however, that while we agreed on the danger we would probably find ourselves in disagreement with the British on the tactics to be followed. The United States was inclined to think that the oil companies should accept the realities of the situation and make the best bargains they could to retain their foothold in the Near East. General Smith hoped that the proposed discussions would not degenerate into a haggling over tactical questions. He did not want a repetition of the Iranian affair in which the United States had constantly been pushing the British to make concessions to the understandable irritation of the British Government. He hoped that in the present case we could agree on general principles without attempting to settle all the tactical details.

Parenthetically, General Smith remarked, [we?] were convinced the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company could have made an acceptable settlement with the Iranian Government two or three years ago on the same fifty-fifty basis as that adopted by the Arabian American Oil Company. He pointed out that Aramco had successfully maintained its position in contrast to the AIOC. He assumed that one thing which had inspired the present British approach was fear that Aramco was about to make further concessions to the Saudi Arabian Government which would have repercussions on British oil interests. He thought Aramco had done very well so far in keeping a little bit ahead of the procession in its dealings with the Arabs and we were not inclined to discourage this policy.

Mr. Scott agreed that this was one, but only one, of the elements which the British Government undoubtedly had in mind. He said the British Government felt the problem of Middle East oil should be approached from a political rather than a commercial basis. There were major political and strategic interests involved. For that reason, his Government wanted the proposed talks to be conducted by political officers rather than oil experts.

Mr. Scott also observed that even from the commercial-financial point of view, the British Government had a more direct interest in Middle East oil than the United States. From this angle, the American Government was interested only in seeing that American companies continued to have successful operations and make profits. The British Government was interested not so much in the profits made by the companies as in the continued free flow of oil payable in sterling, thus avoiding a foreign exchange drain on the British Treasury. Mr. Jernegan replied that this might be a reason why the British themselves should have less objection to larger payments by the oil companies to the Arab Governments. To take a hypothetical case, if IPC should agree to pay Iraq sixty percent of its profits instead of the present fifty, this would have no effect on the flow of sterling oil. Mr. Scott agreed that this seemed to be a valid point.

Mr. Scott left with General Smith the attached memorandum on Middle East oil [1] which, it was understood, was intended to serve as a starting point for the discussions between the Embassy and the Department. It was agreed that arrangements for the talks would be made between Mr. Byroade's office and Mr. Harold Beeley. [2]

MIDDLE EAST OIL

I. THE EASTERN HEMISPHERE'S DEPENDENCE ON MIDDLE EAST OIL

The countries of the Eastern Hemisphere, and in particular those in Western Europe who are members of N.A.T.O., are becoming increasingly dependent on Middle East Oil. At the present time the Middle East is providing Europe with about 70% of total requirements, and about 60% of the requirements of the remainder of the Eastern Hemisphere. It is also becoming an important source of supply for South America. Moreover, as the Middle East is the only major proven production area that is capable within the next few years of a large expansion in output it will be called upon to supply the greater part of the free world's additional requirements outside North America. By 1958 it is expected that the Middle East will be supplying about 90% of the requirements of the Eastern Hemisphere. The maintenance of access to Middle East sources is therefore a vital interest to the entire western world both in peace and war.

[2] A memorandum by Byroade to Waugh and Phleger, dated Aug. 19, not printed, asked them to read this memorandum and its attachment. Byroade's memorandum advised that past conversations with the British had generally had negative results, and he feared the forthcoming talks would be the same. His main concern was that the Department of State would be talking to the British on a general subject on which there was no coordinated government policy line, and he had "reluctantly come to the conclusion that there cannot be any U.S. Government policy line in the near future." II. THREATS TO WESTERN OIL INTERESTS

(i) The confiscation of Persian oil has meant denial of access to Persian resources. While increased output elsewhere has, for all practical purposes, made good this loss, the fact remains that Persia has set a bad example by unilateral action in breach of her solemn undertakings. There remains the possibility that other producing countries, especially in the Middle East, may be tempted to follow the Persian example.

(ii) Apart from the impact of the Persian affair, the growth of militant and often irrational nationalism threatens Western interests throughout the Middle East. The political pressure in the Middle East is such that these countries will have no compunction in using nationalist and xenophobe fanaticism as a weapon against foreign companies, or in diverting against the companies the discontent of the people with conditions obtaining under existing regimes.

(iii) The present situation in Saudi Arabia is of immediate concern. The price negotiations with Aramco, which are tantamount to a renegotiation of a contractual obligation, have been in suspense but are expected to be renewed shortly. The uncertainty of the existing situation, and of its possible outcome, will inevitably affect similar current negotiations in other Middle East countries and notably in Iraq, where, in fact, the pressure has already begun. Moreover the possibility of wider repercussion elsewhere cannot be ignored.

(iv) It is known that the Saudis and the Iraqis have been in close consultation over prices, and are in process of 'ganging up' against the companies, with the object of extorting every cent they can.

(v) The 'pipeline' countries (notably Syria and Lebanon), dissatisfied with present agreements in respect of the pipelines which cross their territories, are demanding a new form of transit agreement involving a sharing of profits, although their contribution in fact amounts to little more than a wayleave.

(vi) Egyptian interferences with the Suez Canal and the growing pressure of the Egyptian Government on the Suez Canal Company may endanger the passage of oil through the Canal.

III. URGENT PROBLEMS

If the burdens imposed upon the oil industry continue to be recklessly increased the ability of the companies to maintain and expand their operations will be jeopardized. The interests of the British and United States Governments are closely allied in all these problems. Certain of them cry out for an early solution, and the case for a coordinated policy towards them is overwhelming. For example:—

(i) What happens in Saudi Arabia is bound to have an effect in neighbouring countries, and it is most important that no precipitate action should be taken during the present Aramco-Saudi negotiations. Urgent consultation between the companies and between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government is therefore most desirable.

(ii) The pipeline negotiations with the transit countries also require co-ordinated Anglo-American action.

IV. ACTION ADVOCATED

Her Majesty's Government would propose the following as appropriate action:

A. General

(i) Both Governments should facilitate consultation between their respective oil companies in order:

(a) to exchange information, and
(b) to work out common policies on particular problems.

The two Governments should also coordinate their own policies towards these problems.

(ii) The two Governments should be ready to support each other's representations on behalf of their respective oil companies in appropriate cases.

(iii) Governments and companies should give urgent consideration to the steps necessary to improve Arab understanding of Western enterprise and intentions. They should encourage the Arabs to develop a sense of common interest with the West and to realize that by cooperating with the West they will be enabled to utilize their oil resources to the best advantage of their countries.

B. Specific

The arrangements contemplated under A (i) above should be made without delay so that there may be full consultation between the Companies concerned and subsequently between the United Kingdom and United States Governments on the subject of—

(i) the Saudi Arabia/Aramco and the Iraq/Iraq Petroleum Company price talks.

(ii) the Syria/Lebanon pipelines transit charges problem. [3]

Memorandum of Conversation, by David Robertson of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 26, 1953.

Subject: Consultation with Aramco Preliminary to U.S.-U.K. Middle East Talks.

Participants: NEA—Mr. Byroade
Mr. Terry Duce, Vice President of Aramco
Mr. Alec Chapman, Washington Representative of Aramco
NE—Mr. Hart
NE—Mr. Robertson
L/E—Mr. Metzger
PED—Mr. Eakens

Mr. Duce called at Mr. Byroade's office at the Department's request to discuss Middle East oil.

In reply to a question by Mr. Byroade, Mr. Duce described his impression of the Iranian situation in the following terms: If as a consequence of the Shah's return to power Anglo-Iranian recovers her property in Iran, AIOC is not likely to shut back its production in Kuwait and Aramco will, therefore, have a problem in Saudi Arabia concerning the level of oil production. However, from what Prime Minister Zehadi has said, it does not appear likely that Iran will make a deal with the British. Mr. Byroade observed that if we are unable to work out a solution for the Iranian situation this time, there may be no next time. In reply to a question by Mr. Duce, he stated that it was a little premature to consult with industry on the situation as we are awaiting advice from our Ambassador at Tehran. He added that there seemed to be two alternatives, one of moving promptly to find a solution while the Shah is enjoying a wave of popularity, or, alternatively, awaiting developments when things were a little more settled. If we move prematurely, it might embarrass the new Government and jeopardize an opportunity of stabilizing their position.

"by the dangers of too much complacency regarding present developments affecting Middle East oil, of too little interest in decisions by companies which seem likely to have serious international repercussions in the near future and of a failure to foresee situations similar to that which resulted in Iran from the attitude of the British Government toward the Anglo-Iranian Company's policy and problems." The despatch concluded that a U.S. Government policy should be developed soon and should be coordinated with the Government of the United Kingdom. (880.2553/8-2053)

Turning to the general picture in the Middle East, Mr. Duce stated that the individual problems in the area should be viewed in the general context of the enormity of the resources of the area. Within two or three generations it may be found that this area contains 200,000,000,000 barrels of oil and as a consequence constitute a major source of energy for the future. Its proven resources were already beyond 75,000,000,000 barrels.

Mr. Byroade then mentioned that the British Government had recently made known its urgent desire to have talks with us concerning Middle East oil. They desired to explore the possibilities of coordinating their policies and actions with ours. The urgency underlying their request was the Aramco negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government. Mr. Duce was informed in general of the points made by the British in their recent note.

Mr. Duce observed that the problem for Aramco was one of price under the 50–50 contract. At the time of negotiating the original contract in 1950 he had informed his people that they would have trouble concerning the special arrangements for a discount as regards the parent companies. However, the parent companies had persisted that this was justified by the extraordinarily large investment entailed in developing the facilities. At that time he felt that it was inherent in the situation that inevitably his company would have to adopt a posted price arrangement for all purchases. Now the expansion program has been carried out and the company must face the problem of price adjustment. Mr. Davies has been authorized to do just this in the forthcoming negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government scheduled to begin on September 5. It is hoped that in the course of these negotiations the border prices previously offered by Aramco would be eliminated. However, he indicated that agreement on a posted price arrangement will not resolve all the problems.

In addition, there are the pipeline problems, particularly in Lebanon and Syria. The parent companies are studying this problem at the present time in New York. It is hoped that a plan may be worked out whereby the pipeline operation (Tapline) will be completely separated from Aramco with an established tariff for the line and payment under transit agreements made on the basis of such an independent operation. It is also possible that some of the pipeline stock may be sold locally and tariffs established therefor taking into account that it is a carrier competing against other carriers such as tankers. This kind of arrangement would be easy to explain, whereas under the existing arrangements it is difficult to explain anything.

In reply to a question, Mr. Duce stated that Mr. Davies had talked with General Manager Gibson of IPC and Mr. Loudon of Shell in London. He was expecting a letter from Davies detailing these conversations. A cable from Davies stated, "Gibson fully informed our approach." Presumably Gibson has informed the Foreign Office of these talks. According to the Davies cable, Gibson was content with the plan whereunder sales would be based on posted prices. Gass and Loudon of Shell, however, had some reservations on the posted price proposal, thus indicating a division of opinion among the British participants in IPC.

Mr. Duce was of the opinion that IPC was disturbed primarily by the retroactive readjustment which Aramco will have to make with SAG. He recalled that Aramco had been asked by SAG to make payments retroactive to 1950. Davies has been authorized to make retroactive payments for 1952 and 1953 and the parent companies would probably yield on 1951 if this became a sticking point in the negotiations. He estimated that the sum involved would be in the neighborhood of $100,000,000.

Mr. Byroade stated that we desired to avoid a position in the forthcoming talks of doing little or nothing to meet the British request for consultations at a time when Aramco would be moving ahead rapidly in its negotiations which in turn would create certain problems for the IPC and other British companies. Mr. Duce replied that he appreciated our position and he felt that Aramco and the U.S. Government could keep each other informed in addition to which Aramco had, as mentioned, already conveyed certain information to IPC. He felt, however, that a constructive approach to these problems would best be achieved by working out some formal arrangement in the Middle East whereunder there would be a means for consulting with the Arab Governments concerned before arriving at any formal agreement with the United Kingdom. In a sense, the individual countries were more competitive with one another as regards the level of oil produced than the companies concerned. If Aramco were to proceed with the type of cooperation with British companies contemplated by the U.K. Government, it would be accused of "ganging up" against the Saudi Arabian Government. It seems imperative that some arrangement be worked out whereby the Arabs could be brought into the picture. It seems preferable initially that coordination take place at the Government level. The Governments could then confer with the companies individually or severally. However, any publicity should be avoided at all costs.

In reply to a question, Mr. Duce opined that the Iraqi Government talks at Riyadh were the reason for the desire of the Foreign Office to hold discussions with the United States Government at this time rather than any needling on the part of IPC. However, it may be a combination of both. Mr. Duce indicated that he had talked to Counselor Beeley only in general terms concerning Aramco plans as the latter had been primarily interested in the Buraimi situation. He had informed Beeley that Aramco would have to respect the wishes of the Saudi Arabian Government insofar as it was possible.

In reply to a question, Mr. Duce saw no objection to the Department holding the proposed talks with the United Kingdom nor to the Department informing the British representative in general terms of Aramco plans. He then pointed out that what happened in the Middle East in respect to the oil situation could have a bearing on West Texas crude price and, therefore, the independent producers of this country were concerned with developments in this area. At this point, he referred to the main problem down the road internationally for the American companies concerned with foreign operations. They may have to give up some freedom for safety or take increasing risks. In this respect, the scalpel should be utilized instead of the axe. Formal Government arrangements involving some control of industry may be necessary.

The essence of the current negotiations, according to Mr. Duce, was that Aramco work out its problems with the Saudi Arabian Government. It would be unfortunate if others dealt with SAG behind Aramco's back utilizing information imparted by Aramco.

Mr. Duce then turned to pipeline arrangements. Ambassador Malik had initiated talks here which were followed by discussions undertaken by Lebanese officials at Beirut. Aramco officials in Beirut then approached President Chamoun and were informed that Malik had no authority to negotiate but had been requested to obtain information. When the Lebanese officials in Beirut expressed the desire to renegotiate the pipeline agreement, Aramco officials there said they had no authority. They were instructed by the parent companies to wait until the new Government came into power. Meanwhile, IPC had undertaken negotiations. The parent companies of Aramco in New York are studying the complexities of the pipeline situation. Mr. Duce stated that he wished to ascertain the progress being made in New York and would inform us as soon as this was forthcoming. There was the problem of establishing a tariff on the entire operation of the line and then of dividing it somehow among the states. The tariff would have to be competitive in relation to other barriers. The division of the total tariff among states could either be on the basis of giving the same amount or making payments according to mileage. The present arrangements provide for cash payments on the basis of volume transitted. Aramco had agreed to border prices with SAG after IPC had agreed to a similar arrangement in Iraq. He reiterated a hope of eliminating border prices in forthcoming negotiations.

Mr. Duce concluded his remarks by stating that some formal arrangement must be worked out whereby the United States, United Kingdom, France and the producing Arab states [would?] consult with representatives of industry participating in an observer or advisory status. Countries transitted might also be included but he had some reservations about including consumer countries because of the resulting size of such [a group?] This group need only have an advisory role as advice on the part of the participating Governments on agreed positions would have a very large influence on the decisions of the companies concerned.

United States Record of the First Session of the United States–United Kingdom Talks on Middle East Oil [1]

Subject: First Session—U.S./U.K. Talks on Middle East Oil

Participants: British Embassy Team—
Mr. Harold Beeley, Counselor
Mr. R.W. Bailey, Political Officer, Near East
Mr. J.A. Beckett, Petroleum Attaché

NE—Mr. Robertson
OMP—Mr. Willis Armstrong
PED—Mr. Robert Eakens
L/E—Mr. Stanley Metzger

Mr. Hart opened the meeting by expressing the regrets of Mr. Byroade that he was unable to attend the opening session because of pressure of work, and by indicating that the Department welcomed the opportunity of holding these talks. He then invited the British to set forth their views.

Mr. Beeley expressed his appreciation for the opportunity of holding these talks, referred to the memorandum which the British Minister had left with the Under Secretary [2] and described the British views in the following terms: The security of Middle East oil is becoming increasingly important to Western Europe, including the United Kingdom. While at the present time the Middle East is providing Europe with about seventy per cent of its total requirements, it is contemplated in the future that this dependency would increase to some ninety per cent. Accordingly, the strategy of the Free World in the event of hostilities would be dependent on some resolution of the problems in the area. These problems are, therefore, highly strategic and political, not just economic in nature and scope. In addition, Middle East oil is of specific importance to the U.K. because it is a large factor in the U.K. balance of payments. For this reason the U.K. wished to exchange views on these problems for the purpose of insuring continued flow of Middle East oil.

At a time when Middle East oil is becoming increasingly important, as noted, the position of the companies concerned is being subjected to increasing threats of rising nationalism such as had been evidenced in the case of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company in Iran. AIOC had developed a very substantial production reaching 30,000,000 tons in 1950 going to zero in consequence of the nationalization. While this gap had been rapidly filled by the increase of production in other countries, particularly Kuwait and Iraq, there is no assurance that a similar gap could again be filled if this type of thing happened in one of the other major producing countries. The self-consciousness inherent in increasing nationalism in Iraq and Saudi Arabia had resulted in increasing pressures respectively on IPC and Aramco. These pressures enjoyed a measure of success due primarily to a lack of coordination between the American and British Governments and companies. While it is not disputed that the Aramco 50-50 agreement negotiated in 1950 was a wise departure, IPC was forced to come in line in 1951 as a result of pressures generated from these negotiations. [3] In turn, IPC's concessions to Iraq's demands went a little farther than the Aramco agreement and resulted in new Saudi pressures on Aramco. As a consequence of new Aramco-Saudi negotiations about to begin, IPC is likely to be further pressed. This process could continue until it arrived at a point where the companies might be forced out of business. It must, therefore, be watched and somehow brought under control.

There are also the transit problems in Syria and Lebanon. These countries were seeking additional revenues. Tapline is in a stronger position since its agreements have been ratified. Lebanon has signed but not ratified its agreement with IPC, and Syria may have not as yet signed its agreement. IPC and Aramco should be able to agree on a demonstrably reasonable principle for transit payments, thereby bettering their respective positions to resist exaggerated demands currently being made. This principle should be a fair one, which can justify itself to the people of the transit countries.

[3] For documentation, see Foreign Relations, 1951, vol. v, pp. 268 ff.

There is also the problem of the passage of oil through the Suez Canal. On a tonnage basis in 1953, seventy-five percent of the north bound traffic through the Canal was oil.

There is also the problem of a possible return of Persian oil to world markets as a result of measures undertaken by the new Government in Iran. It may be necessary to cut production in other states in the Middle East to make room for Persian oil. If this happens, it would be bound to give rise to recriminations among the Arab governments concerned. The U.S. and U.K. should, therefore, work out some equitable principle upon which any necessary cutbacks would be made.

Mr. Beeley emphasized that the U.K. considered these talks were not being held for the purpose of finding specific solutions for the problems at hand. The U.K. believes that the objective should be to reach agreement on the principles involved and the means of approaching the problems. It was hoped that the two governments might agree, as the result of these talks, to:

1. Facilitate consultations among the British and American companies concerned regarding concession and transit problems at hand;
2. Consult periodically (at least once every six months) for the purpose of reviewing the situation in the Middle East;
3. Undertake diplomatic representations as necessary to the countries concerned, in order to support previously agreed positions; and,
4. Join with the British and American companies in an effort to encourage better understanding among the Arabs of Western enterprise and a more constructive use of the large oil revenues accruing to Near Eastern Governments. Such revenues could be the basis of a rapid increase in the standards of living in the oil producing states. Somehow the Arab Governments should be made to feel a real sense of partnership with us.

Mr. Hart responded that we generally agreed with the oil picture as presented. He suggested that the discussions first focus their attention on the question: "How does the U.K. envisage that the Governments and the companies would get together?" He alluded to the fact that the principle of 50-50 had been accepted by Aramco in 1950 and by IPC in 1951 and that the question of price had now arisen under these agreements. What would be the basis for inter-government or inter-company consultations on price, for example?

Mr. Beeley accepted this suggestion and turned to certain problems concerning prices for the sale of oil. He stated that IPC sales and accounting to the Government of Iraq were based on posted prices. A ten per cent discount was allowed to parent companies on the basis of long term contracts. If in the forthcoming negotiations Aramco eliminates the discount practice in respect to its parent companies, IPC would have to do so and would be well advised to take the initiative before being called on by the Iraqi Government. However, if Aramco simply reduced its discount, the question of making retroactive payments might be avoided. The Saudi Arabian and Iraqi Governments were exchanging views and it seemed likely that Iraq would demand concessions similar to any made to Saudi Arabia. The effect of Aramco negotiations on Kuwait was not known since Kuwait revenues were based on profits from actual sales with no particular tie to posted prices. At this point Mr. Beckett observed that there was a slightly different situation as between the companies in that KOC sold primarily to non-parent concerns, while IPC and Aramco sold primarily to their parent organizations. He added that while there had been agreement, as indicated, on the 50-50 principle, these discussions could usefully explore what was meant by the 50-50 principle. While not greatly concerned about going to the 50-50 principle on a current basis, IPC is opposed to retroactive adjustments.

Mr. Armstrong then pointed to the fact that there were certain ties among the companies in that two American companies, Socony and Jersey, participated both in Aramco and IPC and a single British Company, AIOC, participated in both KOC and IPC. Mr. Robertson suggested that developments on Middle East problems may be related to developments in other areas. The 50-50 principle had, for instance, earlier been adopted both in the Far East and in Venezuela. The specific problems of the Near East might, therefore, be considered in light of similar developments in other areas.

Mr. Beeley stated that once production began to fall, there seemed little question that the producing countries would endeavor to maintain their revenues at peak levels, driving, if necessary, beyond the 50-50 principle.

Mr. Eakens then mentioned some of the differences in the problems of the respective producing countries. Revenues derived from the 50-50 principle would not be identical in that the grades of oil produced were of differing quality, selling at varying prices. The costs of production differed. Kuwait oil, for instance, was at a transportation disadvantage in that it had to be shipped farther at greater cost to points of consumption. IPC had conceded the principle of a guaranteed minimum which was not the case of the other companies. Accounting of revenues to the respective countries differed in that Kuwait revenues were based on actual sales, while Saudi Arabian and Iraqi were based on prices having relationship to posted prices. Company payments to the Government in Venezuela, which are the pattern for existing Saudi Arabia and Iraq concession agreements are based on posted prices. The establishment of such a pattern should be helpful in that it enables the price question to be self-adjusting.

Mr. Beeley then mentioned that he wished to assure the group that the U.K. was not primarily concerned in protecting the profit position of the British companies. The U.K. Government was more interested in improving its relations with and stabilizing conditions in the countries concerned in order to ensure the smoother flow of oil. The IPC had greatly improved its relations with the Government of Iraq as a result of the 1951 agreement. Its concern now was about the future and the repercussions of the Aramco negotiations. He reiterated that if Aramco eliminated the parent company discount and made retroactive payments, similar demands would be made on IPC. He added that IPC had during his residence in Baghdad been the subject of continuing pressure to increase its production commensurate with that in Kuwait. At that time there was some question about the single company operation of the very large concession held by IPC.

He then observed that he felt his side had not answered the question raised by Mr. Hart, "How does the U.K. envisage that the governments and companies concerned would get together?" He suggested that Mr. Beckett address a few remarks in reply to this question. Mr. Beckett stated that there seemed to be no consultations among the operating companies through their parent holding companies. He admitted that competitive forces and the anti-trust laws might be limiting factors. He mentioned ancillary activities by companies additional to the obligations under the 50-50 principle. He observed that IPC had performed its obligations according to contract but had not been pressed as Aramco had been in this respect. Mr. Armstrong questioned whether our bargaining is improved by the U.S. and U.K. Governments and oil companies getting together. Mr. Hart observed that Aramco's position had in the past been fairly strong with the Saudi Arabian Government because it had stood on its own feet and maintained its position separate and apart from the U.S. Government. Certain advantages had flowed from this separation of identity, particularly during the early days of the development of the Israel State.

Mr. Beeley interjected that he desired to focus interest on the need for consultations between the companies concerned, particularly Aramco and IPC concerning specific problems. We should discuss the manner of Government consultation and how to bring about better understanding with the Arab States in later sessions. This observation gave Mr. Armstrong the opportunity to suggest that the U.S. Government check the status of transit and concession arrangements and American company views on closer consultation with British companies. We could then discuss the matter further at the next session. Mr. Beeley responded that this suggestion was excellent and meanwhile his people could look into similar matters with AIOC and IPC.

Mr. Metzger stated that, with respect to American companies exchanging information with British companies, the American companies needed to take into account the anti-trust laws of the United States in connection with the degree to which they could lawfully exchange information. In addition, of course, they had the responsibility for determining the extent to which they deemed it wise to exchange information, within the area which they considered to be permitted by the anti-trust laws. He added that the anti-trust laws were a matter of serious concern generally in relation to the exchange of information problem. The U.K. representatives indicated that they understood this.

As regards the pipeline operations, Mr. Eakens observed that there were certain differences between Tapline and IPC. Tapline moved oil from one body of water to another and was, therefore, in direct competition with tankers. In contrast, IPC pipelines were the only means of moving oil which would otherwise have little value at the point of production. It may be difficult, therefore, to apply a common denominator of principles to transit arrangements. Mr. Beeley added that there was also a difference in the politics of the countries concerned. While the respective pipelines transitted Syria and Lebanon in common, IPC was accountable in addition to Iraq and Tapline to Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Hart then referred to the fact that the Arab League in its Petroleum Committee had recently given consideration to certain aspects of Middle East oil. He mentioned particularly the possibility of the "have nots" badgering the "haves" for some equitable sharing of the enormous revenues involved. When Mr. Beeley observed that the "haves" were not likely to share with the "have nots" on any voluntary basis, it was pointed out that the countries transitted by pipelines might be in a position to bargain in this respect. It was agreed that both governments should endeavor to ascertain the extent to which oil matters had been considered by the Arab League and the nature of any decisions made. All were aware that the Arab League Petroleum Committee had adopted some very general resolution concerning the oil boycott as applied to Israel.

In summary, it was also agreed that both sides would consult with their companies in order to identify the specific problems relating to basis of prices and transit payments and that these matters would be discussed at the next meeting scheduled for Tuesday, September 31 [1] at 3:00 p. m., in the NEA Conference Room.

After the meeting Mr. Hart briefed Mr. Byroade on the highlights of the discussions. Mr. Byroade agreed that we should contact the American partners in IPC (Socony and Standard of New Jersey) for the purposes indicated above. Consultation had already taken place with Mr. Duce of Aramco on August 26, 1953.

United States Record of the Second Session of the United States-United Kingdom Talks on Middle East Oil [1]

Mr. Hart opened the meeting by informing the group we had received certain information concerning the Arab League Petroleum Committee meeting of July 5, 1953. This information was based on communications from Cairo and indicated that the Director of Mines for Fuel Affairs was Egypt's delegate to the July 5 meeting. The Director had been most uncommunicative both before and after the meeting. However, from other sources we had learned that the topics for discussion were a unified petroleum policy (largely wished by Egypt) and the Haifa oil refinery— where it obtains its crude and how to intensify the boycott against it. Exchange of information among Arab countries on petroleum matters was also discussed. Furthermore, these subjects were to be discussed at a meeting of the Economy and Finance Ministers of the League member states, possibly in September. Another report indicated that the member states of the Arab League had worked out an arrangement to keep each other promptly informed of any changes affecting the petroleum industry in the respective countries. This suggested that if any member state is able to improve its take from the international oil industry, the details will be promptly available to other members for such exploitation as they can give them.

[1] Drafted by Robertson.

Mr. Beeley thanked Mr. Hart for this information and stated that his side had not as yet received such a detailed report. Promptly after the first session on August 27, the British Embassy had asked London for information on this subject. London had relayed the inquiry to Cairo and the British Embassy at Cairo had made an initial reply based on information obtained from the Assistant Secretary General of the Arab League. This communication stated that the Petroleum Committee had recommended a coordinated oil policy and had considered the subject of Arab oil boycott as applied to foreign firms engaged in sale and assembly activities in Israel and the Arab States. The Petroleum Committee had met twice. Mr. Hart observed that we had information on the application of the boycott to American marketing firms but would like to check the matter as regards those having assembly plants.

Mr. Beeley then reminded the group that this session was to deal with subjects under two headings, namely the Aramco and IPC negotiations and the problems of transit. Mr. Eakens detailed developments in this respect on the basis of consultations with American companies, particularly Aramco. Aramco is scheduled to resume negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government early in September. The parent company instructions to Mr. Davies, President of Aramco, were to go only as far as necessary to reach agreement with the Saudi Arabian Government. Mr. Davies had informed the General Manager of IPC concerning Aramco plans. He had also discussed this matter with Mr. Loudon of Shell Oil in London. Aramco may have to go to a basis of posted or realized prices in calculating the 50-50 principle in its negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government. This would have repercussions on IPC. Aramco was authorized to make concessions on the discount. It hopes to make a settlement without retroactive payments. However, it has been authorized to make concessions in the latter respect but serious problems may arise if required to make retroactive payments all the way back to the beginning of 1950. The basis for making retroactive payments would be complete implementation of the 50-50 principle to the benefit and at demand of the Saudi Arabian Government.

At this point Mr. Hart observed that Aramco considered the application of discounts in 1950 were justified by the very large investments involved in developing its facilities in Saudi Arabia and marketing outlets outside of the country. There followed a general discussion as to whether posted prices once established would be self-adjusting. It was observed that situations differ in the various producing countries. Kuwait revenues were based on actual sales contracts as negotiated, usually below the posted price for the area. Mr. Eakens observed that discount in sales to subsidiaries or parents of the producing company are harder to explain than discounts in sales to outsiders, particularly when the Arab governments were involved.

Mr. Beeley thanked us for information obtained from the American companies and informed the group that he had certain information in respect to IPC. In September 1951 the Iraqi Government had by letter informed IPC that if Iran or Saudi Arabia or any other producing state received a higher revenue per ton, it would require a corresponding upward re-adjustment of the agreement concluded between Iraq and IPC. IPC replied by letter that it would agree to consider such a matter if it arose. The wise policy for IPC would be not to haggle over terms but to make the Government of Iraq an offer if the situation arose. Iraq now gets a border price representing an increased share as the oil proceeds in transit. In consequence, Iraq enjoys this advantage over Saudi Arabia which as yet may not enjoy the benefits of the border price. Mr. Eakens interjected that the Saudi Arabian Government had raised the border price question early in its negotiations with Aramco but negotiations in this respect had not as yet been concluded.

Mr. Beeley then turned to the possibility of the resumption of activity in the Persian oil fields. Because of the delicacy of any future negotiations in Persia, it was extremely important to the U.K. that the principle of discount be maintained in the Arab States. The elimination of any discount in negotiations with Arab States may have a most unfortunate effect on negotiations in Iran. In turn, any concessions made to Iran may later plague the oil companies operating in the Arab States. The situation which may eventually evolve in Iran could result in a nationalized company selling to marketers or consumers with or without a discount.

Mr. Armstrong asked whether it would be possible that a settlement with Iran would be made for compensation with no arrangement for marketing; Iran making a separate arrangement with distributors selling through outside agents at or under posted prices. Mr. Beeley replied that Iran could not do this as it was not capable of taking on the obligation for compensation programs plus capital outlays involved in establishing an enormous marketing organization. Mr. Beckett joined in to say that compensation would have to be paid over a period of time and it was difficult to envisage that it could be paid in any other way. Mr. Beeley added that the U.K. may arrange to purchase the oil at the Persian Gulf on some sort of sharing-of-the-revenues arrangement with Iran under which Iran would in turn make payments on compensation from its part. Mr. Beckett added that such an arrangement would in all probability relate to products as Iran had never exported crude in any substantial quantity and presumably the refinery would be put back into operation as soon as possible.

Mr. Metzger suggested that such an arrangement with a discount for compensation purposes may be attractive. Mr. Beckett replied that AIOC would insist that compensation be separated so that discounts would not be chargeable to AIOC marketing cost.

Mr. Armstrong then surmised that the Iranian negotiations could conceivably encompass a number of alternatives under which AIOC with its large marketing outlets as purchaser, and also as recipient of compensation, may come into the picture. Even if the discount principle were abandoned in the Arab States, it could be included in any Persian arrangement under some other name. He hastily added that he was not arguing for or against any particular arrangement or any size of discount or in behalf of posted prices or realized profits. AIOC seems to be a logical outlet for Iran to market its oil on which its economy so heavily depends for revenues.

Mr. Hart inquired whether the discount problem could be resolved by offering some form of compensation. Mr. Beeley thought not. He added that what his Government wanted to prevent was a situation whereunder all the states lined up, replaced individual companies with nationalized organizations and expressed a desire to sell at seaboard to marketing organizations should the Iranian case take that turn. Any arrangement in Iran will become known and may pose a most unfortunate precedent.

Mr. Armstrong inquired whether the situation in Iran was not different from that in the Arab States in that Iran had a big refinery and sold products, whereas oil was sold primarily in the form of crude from the Arab States. Mr. Beeley reminded him that Aramco had a good size refinery and he doubted in any event that this would make much difference.

Mr. Beckett stated that the Persian Government cut had come out of crude sales and refinery operations were paid for as a service. The removal of the discount in basing accounting on posted prices would result in going beyond the 50-50 principle. If the companies cut the posted price, Iraq could go on the market with up to 12½% of the crude which it had the right to demand under the concession arrangement.

Mr. Beeley suggested that the group turn its attention to the transit problem. Mr. Robertson indicated that our consultations with Aramco indicated the following information: The American parent organizations were studying the problem but had reached no conclusions. They were considering the various methods for computing payments to be made to the countries transitted. One alternative could be an equal division of a total sum among the countries transitted. Another alternative would be on the basis of mileage. Still another would be on the basis of ton miles. Finally, the transit company could call on representatives of the Arab Governments to decide among themselves how to divide up periodically stipulated sums. Consideration was also being given to establishing a separate company with a published tariff on a basis which would be competitive with tankers. This arrangement would be much easier to explain than the present situation. Sales of stock in such a company might also be involved.

Mr. Beeley observed that IPC also had not finalized its position. The Foreign Office feels that some form of tax agreement based on profits would more likely be acceptable to Syria and Lebanon than other forms of payments. However, the British companies objected to the principle of taxation in that it would almost be impossible to limit the sovereignty of the countries concerned in respect to increasing rates of taxation once that principle has been established. IPC prefers payments on a ton-mile basis. However, this will not satisfy the Lebanese as they feel that their short miles of transit are as important as the long transit miles of Syria. The British were also considering some form of separate pipeline operating company for IPC but would be reluctant to make such a move because of the implications involved.

Mr. Beeley stated that in view of the many complexities involved in reaching agreements between our governments as to principles which might be applied, there was increasing importance on the need for closer company consultations. The complexities not only dealt with the various aspects of operations, the types of payments involved, the political situations in the different countries, but also taxation measures both in the producing countries and the countries of residence of the parent organizations. As regards the transit companies, some tax method would be preferable to a 50–50 sharing of profits. He hoped the companies could find something which would stand up to examination. His Government would be inclined to back up any agreed company position that seemed reasonable. The question was raised as to whether the electric power supply arrangement between Norway, Denmark and Sweden might not be a good example. Mr. Armstrong thought not in view of its pooling aspects.

Mr. Hart then suggested that Syria and Lebanon, as transit companies, may wish to take crude from the pipelines for local refineries. He also mentioned that the countries transitted perform certain services in return for revenues such as providing police protection. Referring back to Mr. Beeley's suggestion for closer company consultation, Mr. Robertson stated that aside from the limitations of anti-trust laws, the American companies had mentioned the limiting factor involved in competitive and negotiating practices whereunder each company desired that its hole-card not be revealed. Mr. Armstrong added that a special committee is studying anti-trust and its implications and these studies would take some time. Our people were aware of the benefits derived from the anti-trust laws, as well as the complications when applied abroad.

Mr. Beeley said he would like to emphasize the need for closer Aramco–IPC consultation and wondered if this may not be further pressed. He was informed that the Aramco discussions with IPC in London had been evidence of progress in this direction and was considered by the companies as being as far as they could go in view of the anti-trust implications. Mr. Beeley continued that closer company consultation was necessary if agreed positions were to be arrived at in order that a reasonable case could be made for our Ambassadors to support at the diplomatic level for the purpose of smoothing over company problems.

Mr. Beeley suggested that the next meeting consider the means whereunder the U.S. and U.K. Governments and companies could closer consult and the additional item of educating the Middle East people to lay a foundation for better understanding. The participants agreed with this suggestion and that the next meeting take place at 3:00 p. m. on September 9. Since both Mr. Hart and Mr. Armstrong would be taking leave between September 12 and 22, it was also agreed that an additional ad hoc meeting could be held if any urgent question came up; otherwise, the next following meeting could take place soon after their return.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of the Petroleum Policy Staff (Eakens)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 1, 1953.[1]

Subject: Views of American Participants in IPC on the Middle East Oil Situation

Participants: Mr. Charles F. Darlington, Socony-Vacuum Oil Company, Inc.

---

[1] This memorandum of conversation was prepared on Sept. 23.

Mr. Charles Lockett, Standard Oil Company (New Jersey)
Mr. Robertson—NE
Mr. Eakens—PED

Mr. Darlington and Mr. Lockett are the chief officials of the Near East Development Company through which Jersey and Socony jointly hold their 23.75 per cent interest in IPC.

They were invited to come to Washington to discuss their views as the American participants in IPC on the Middle East oil situation. The Department wished to be fully informed concerning their views in connection with the U.S.-U.K. oil talks now in progress.

The company representatives were first asked whether they believed closer discussions on their part with the British oil companies would be desirable. They were also asked to what extent IPC knows of the plans of Aramco and Tapline through their ownership in the two companies. Mr. Darlington said that Aramco had in the past prevented the American IPC partners from keeping IPC fully informed regarding Aramco's operations. This resulted mainly from the California and Texas interests in Aramco holding back Jersey and Socony. Mr. Harding of Socony once stated that California and Texas had "sealed his lips" regarding Aramco's operations. Mr. Darlington believed that Socony and Jersey would generally favor closer discussions whereas California and Texas probably would not. He felt, however, that the companies already were going about as far in such discussions as they would be willing to go without antitrust clearance. Mr. Lockett, however, did not believe that the companies would wish to discuss everything with IPC. He felt that there would be Aramco matters which, as a matter of tactics, Aramco would wish to keep to itself. For closer discussions to be carried out, Mr. Darlington believed that some new mechanism having government sponsorship or sanction would be required.

There was then a lengthy discussion of the negotiating position of Aramco in regard to the removal of the discount and the basing of the payments to the Saudi Government on posted prices. The two company representatives disagreed on Aramco's basis of negotiation. Mr. Lockett contended that Aramco was authorized to agree to settle with Saudi Arabia only on the basis of net realization. Mr. Darlington on the other hand, said that the 50-50 to which Aramco was authorized to agree was to be based on posted prices whether or not such prices were realized in actual sales. Mr. Darlington telephoned later to say that his interpretation was correct and that in a subsequent discussion he had with Mr. Lockett, Mr. Lockett agreed. New instructions, however, had been sent to Mr. Davies, Chairman of Aramco, on Friday, August 28. These instructions did not change the basis of negotiations previously agreed to but they did introduce a proposal for the establishment of buffer companies which would operate as follows: A buffer company would be established by each of the Aramco parents. The buffer companies would purchase oil from Aramco at a discount of 18.3 per cent off the presented posted price of $1.97, or at $1.61 per barrel for 36° A.P.I. gravity oil. This is the same percentage discount which was in effect under the old price when Aramco sold to its parent companies at $1.43 per barrel and the posted price was $1.75. If the oil which a buffer company has purchased from Aramco is sold at the posted price, the buffer company will make the sale direct to the user of the oil. It will then share equally with Saudi Arabia its profit on the purchase from Aramco and the sale at the posted price the same as Aramco shares its profits on producing and selling to the buffer company at $1.61 per barrel. If the oil which a buffer company has purchased from Aramco is not sold at the full posted price, the buffer company will sell the oil to another subsidiary of the same parent company at the posted price and the subsidiary which buys the oil from the buffer company will sustain any loss in the transaction. The buffer company thus makes all sales at the posted price and accounts for its profits to the Saudi Arabian Government on the basis of the posted price regardless of the actual price at which the oil is sold.

Apparently this proposal of settling with Saudi Arabia on the basis of posted price, whether or not such prices are actually realized, was put forward and insisted upon by California and Texas. Socony and Jersey apparently would prefer to settle with Saudi Arabia on the basis of net realized prices. In response to an inquiry as to why California and Texas were willing to go this far, Mr. Darlington said that they are scared, that Aramco is their only concession in the Middle East and that they feel that this is necessary in order to protect their concession. Mr. Darlington also volunteered that California and Texas being relative newcomers in such concession operations are more "evangelical" than the older and more experienced companies.

As to the 50–50 plan generally, the company representatives felt that it is here to stay and that there will be no alternative but for IPC to go to the full 50–50 when and if Aramco does so. Mr. Darlington personally did not think that going to 50–50 was going to settle anything. He believes that after 50–50 has been agreed upon the Middle East countries will continue to endeavor to obtain a larger and larger share of the profits from the oil operations within their countries.

While the company representatives do not like the idea of retroactive payments, they believed that whatever arrangement is made by Aramco with regard to such payments will have to be made by IPC. They did not believe that they would be relieved of having to make retroactive payments to IPC if the Aramco discount was simply reduced rather than completely abolished. The British participants in IPC, as indicated by the British representatives in the U.S.-U.K. oil talks, apparently believe that they would be less vulnerable to retroactive payments if the discount were reduced rather than wiped out altogether. IPC naturally will regret having to make any changes in its concession agreement simply because of a change in the oil situation in the Middle East outside of Iraq and over which IPC has no control. IPC is at peace with Iraq and there is no pressure on the part of Iraq to get rid of the existing discount. The discount was negotiated with Iraq in the 1951 negotiation and it was fully understood and accepted by Iraq. Mr. Darlington felt, however, that the letter which IPC had written to Iraq saying that IPC would consider a change in the concession terms if better terms were made by some other company in the Middle East represented a firm commitment on the part of IPC to raise payments to Iraq if such payments were increased elsewhere.

In regard to the renegotiation of IPC's transit agreements with Syria and Lebanon, very little is happening at the present time. IPC considers that its negotiations with Syria have simply been suspended and that they will be resumed again at such time as Syria indicates it wishes to do so. The company representatives did not believe that there is much to be done in regard to the transit negotiations. They believe that the pattern which will be established by Aramco will have to be followed by IPC. The Aramco negotiators are authorized to agree to a tariff for the part of Tapline in Saudi Arabia and to split the profit based on this tariff equally with the Saudi Arabian Government. Aramco has in mind a tariff of 40 cents per barrel between the Persian Gulf and Sidon and the establishment of roughly 66 per cent of this figure, or about 25 cents per barrel, as the tariff applicable to Saudi Arabia. Until the Aramco negotiations are completed and it is known what arrangements have been made with Saudi Arabia in regard to Tapline, there is not much to be done in regard to transit arrangements with the other countries.

United States Record of the Third Session of the United States-United Kingdom Talks on Middle East Oil [1]

Mr. Hart invited Mr. Beeley to comment on the items to be considered by this session of the U.S./U.K. talks on Middle East oil. Mr. Beeley opened his remarks by stating that he would first like to discuss the question of how the interested companies should meet to discuss the specific questions involved in working out transit agreements. The Foreign Office had suggested that IPC and Tapline meet at the management level, holding several meetings before initiating negotiations with the transit countries. Thereafter the negotiators should consult on the spot as the negotiations proceed. It was hoped that this could be fitted into some sort of procedure meeting the requirements of U.S. anti-trust legislation. Mr. Hart observed that the Foreign Office possibly had in mind, in respect to pipeline negotiations, the kind of discussions undertaken between Davies and Gibson in London. Mr. Beeley indicated agreement.

Mr. Beeley continued that reports from London indicated that the American oil companies' representatives there were apprehensive over the Davies/Gibson type of talks. Mr. Armstrong observed that as of the middle of September, the oil companies which were defendants in the cartel case would be called on to respond to the Government complaint and were instructed to turn in the documents pertaining to the case. During the course of the past summer they were supposed to have been turning in these documents. The Gulf Oil Company had been complying with the Government request by turning documents over to the Government. Mr. Beckett interjected that he understood the hearings in the case were to begin on September 14. Mr. Armstrong continued that previously under the criminal case, all documents turned in would have been available to the Grand Jury and thus would have become known to members of the public serving on the Grand Jury. However, since a civil suit had been instituted to replace the criminal proceedings, no documents would be made public until a screening committee consisting of Government agencies has reviewed them. However, there would be no restraint on testimony given by witnesses. We may need a legal opinion on the U.K. suggestion that the IPC and Tapline representatives get together. Mr. Hart agreed that we could explore the legal aspects.

[1] Drafted by Robertson.

Mr. Robertson recalled that in addition to the restraints deriving from the anti-trust laws, there was also the matter of the oil companies being restrained by virtue of traditional commercial and negotiating practices.

Mr. Eakens stated that the Aramco was thinking in terms of a separate pipeline company with a published tariff, slightly below the level of tanker cost, at a figure of about forty cents. Under such an arrangement, the profits on the line would be shared with the Government as in the case of the production.

Mr. Hart informed the group that Aramco has received a summons by the Saudi Arabian Government to Riyadh for the resumption of negotiation on September 24. The Saudi Arabian Government representatives would be headed by Prince Feisal.

Mr. Metzger observed that there is a close line between exchange of information, such as publication of trade statistics on the one hand, and "collusion and conspiracy" to fix prices, divide markets and other acts in restraint of trade on the other. Trade associations have been attacked in one or two instances for their activities. Attorneys for the oil companies, therefore, might well pause before approving the U.K. suggested procedure of the pipeline representatives getting together before and during the course of the forthcoming negotiations.

At this point Mr. Beeley inquired whether the purpose of exchanges of information has a bearing on the case: for instance, would exchanges of geological data be permissible? Mr. Metzger responded that it depended on the purpose involved. Since the enactment of the anti-trust laws, the anti-trust division of the Department of Justice had been loathe to give advisory opinions. It seemed to him that the only way to get an opinion is to get an oil company judgment on the question. Where you get over the line is touchy business in any exchange of information. Any advice from the Department of State to the companies would not absolve the companies from anti-trust prosecution even if they strictly adhered to the Department's advice. The Department must, therefore, be very careful in the extent to which it advises any American oil company to get together with British companies in any particular set of negotiations; essentially the companies, which are subject to the anti-trust laws, must make the judgment themselves, since theirs is the risk under the law.

Mr. Beeley continued by expressing his understanding that both the British and American pipeline companies were thinking along similar lines. It would be advantageous for these companies to exchange information on conclusions reached before undertaking any negotiations. He hoped, therefore, that we would examine the legal aspects at the earliest possible moment. Mr. Metzger responded that the matter could be put to the companies.

Mr. Beeley suggested that the Anglo-American negotiations of 1945 might be a precedent in that the oil companies were called into the picture. Mr. Eakens observed that the Anglo-American oil agreement negotiations were conducted under the sponsorship of the two Governments and the oil companies concerned only came into the picture to provide information on a basis of requests from the participating governments.

Mr. Armstrong stated that foreign plantation owners in Indonesia had consulted in the past and he assumed that a similar procedure had been conducted elsewhere. This might be an indication as to the extent to which individuals could exchange information.

Mr. Metzger stated that the case of the plantation owners may not fall within the meaning of "commerce" as used in the Sherman Act. He added that consulting on the part of an individual or company with its Government could hardly be considered as conspiratorial under the Sherman Act. The provisions of the Act were directed to actions among companies and individuals. Collective bargaining by labor or management on an industry or area-wide basis was also not considered in contravention of the Act. However, price fixing by labor unions collusively with management would be a violation. Until oil company operations, foreign or domestic, are given an exemption by legislation as had been done in the case of aviation, the sword of Damocles would hang heavily over head and the oil companies must make their judgments accordingly. Mr. Beeley observed that in his opinion the U.K. proposal would not be in the nature of price fixing or market dividing or otherwise in restraint of trade.

Mr. Hart then suggested that the group turn its attention to how we may lay an educational base, the other item for consideration at this session.

Mr. Beeley stated that the position of the oil companies was precarious because of the ignorance of public opinion as regards the nature of oil operations. Heavy pressures continued against them as a result of rising nationalism and sensitivity of the countries concerned. In Iraq, the companies are producing a certain amount of propaganda concerning their operations to an audience of limited literacy. Baghdad newspapers had never seen an oil field but constantly carried articles of a critical nature. IPC had invited people to visit the oil fields and those few who accepted seemed to take a broader view. However, there was a limited response, possibly for the reason that some people did not wish to change their views. The question is whether the companies have the capacities of coping with a problem of this sort and whether additional machinery is necessary. A number of additional alternatives have been considered by the Foreign Office but none have been put forth with any enthusiasm. One suggestion which the Foreign Office wished him to put forth for the purpose of exploration, but not in any sense as a commitment, is the establishment of some form of international consultation on or control of Middle East or world oil through a petroleum council with advisory powers. The Governments of the principal producer and consumer states could participate in the petroleum council. The task would be to achieve a balance and generally broader understanding between producers and consumers.

Mr. Hart inquired whether participating countries could be kept interested in staying in such an organization once it were established. Crude oil must be competitive with coal and this might be a limiting factor. Would consumers have an effective whip in that some of them have indigenous supplies of coal? The factor of price might also be pertinent. Mr. Beckett responded that he thought public opinion and price would be factors. Consuming governments were more powerful politically than producing governments and this might contribute to bringing about a proper balance.

The ILO was cited as an example of how such an arrangement might work out. In it, facts were exchanged and the organization made recommendations to the participating members. The 1945 Anglo-American oil agreement, if ratified by the Senate, would have given treaty status to a study group where information could be exchanged among the participating governments and the oil companies involved. The wheat agreement could be cited as a precedent for a treaty. The rubber study group could be cited as a precedent in this respect. It had some twenty interested countries participating. There are other study groups in cotton, wool and tin. The question of an international oil study group posed certain different problems, however, in that it would involve large companies and governments of a very disparate nature.

Mr. Metzger observed that under an international oil agreement, the Arab countries might act collectively sooner than otherwise. Mr. Beeley responded that while the Foreign Office considered this possibility as mitigating against such an agreement, it seemed to him that the Arab countries were already getting together. An oil commission or study group in which they participated would give them greater knowledge of the implications involved, would permit them to participate and contribute their views to studies made and would inform them of what goes on in other areas.

Mr. Eakens observed that the Anglo-American oil agreement of 1945 was designed to cover the kind of situation we were now confronted with. Its objectives of providing access to the oil resources and of orderly development seemed equally applicable today. The agreement provided for establishing an International Petroleum Commission to make studies, exchange information and facilitate consultation with their nationals engaged in the petroleum industry.

Mr. Beeley stated that the advantages of an international oil treaty would be (1) it would give the governments concerned a feeling of having more knowledge of oil company operations, (2) if a dispute arose between a government and a foreign company, it could be referred to the commission, and (3) such a commission would facilitate the making of studies and exchange of views.

Mr. Robertson suggested that our two governments might well make studies of the merits of an oil treaty.

Mr. Armstrong stated that in the past we have not sought Congressional approval for participating in commodity study groups. We had to go to Congress for approval of the wheat and sugar agreements. We are subject to some criticism on a point of order if participation in a study group is found objectionable by Congress. This is a factor of importance in considering an oil study group, especially in view of the opposition to the Anglo-American oil agreement of 1945.

Mr. Robertson observed that the situation today differed in many ways from that which prevailed when the Anglo-American oil agreement was transmitted in 1945 to the Senate for ratification.

At this point a general discussion ensued concerning the use of an oil treaty or study group as a vehicle, in view of anti-trust limitations, for holding exchanges among governments, between the participating countries and interested oil companies, and among the oil companies serving in advisory panels in response to requests made by the participating governments.

Mr. Hart inquired whether the U.K. would have a problem similar to ours in that in the past there had been some difference between companies which were purely domestic and those which also conducted foreign operations. Mr. Beeley replied that the U.K. has no such problem as there are no domestic interests which conflicted with those of the overseas companies.

Mr. Robertson inquired whether the U.K. would envisage an oil treaty in its inception as being bilateral or multilateral. Mr. Beeley replied that it should be undertaken from the beginning on a multilateral basis in order to encourage a sense of partnership with the West on the part of the producing states.

Mr. Armstrong observed that all commodity organizations were open-ended for interested governments and the USSR could presumably not be excluded if a similar pattern were followed in oil. In this connection, Mr. Eakens observed that if the USSR came in we would have little to lose as free world information was not classified anyway and we could then badger the Russians to reveal statistics which in the past have been kept secret.

Mr. Beeley stated that we should look into the implications of an Anglo-American oil treaty or alternatively some form of commodity study group in view of the current situation in the oil industry, particularly its position in the Middle East.

Mr. Hart inquired whether the Middle East countries would have a common bond in the matter of conservation. There followed a general discussion concerning conservation which revealed that it is not in fact a problem because each oil pool in the area is under single management and conservation measures in the United States are directed at situations in which more than one producer is concerned.

Mr. Beeley suggested that the next meeting cover the two subjects: (1) the legal aspects of the U.K. suggestion that pipeline company representatives consult before and during negotiations and (2) the merits of an oil treaty or some form of commodity study group. He reiterated that the question of an oil treaty was one in which his Government was putting forth as an idea to be explored but not with official endorsement. It was agreed that these items be discussed at the next meeting scheduled at 3 p.m. on September 24 in the NEA conference room.

Mr. Hart observed that Aramco was gratified that the Saudi Arabian Government had hired as consultant the American firm of Degolyer and McNaughton without any request being advanced on the part of the oil companies.

Mr. Beeley inquired whether we had obtained information from the American oil companies concerning their views on the legal aspects of the U.K. suggestion that British and American pipeline company representatives consult before and during the course of any negotiations for the purpose of meeting the demands of the transit countries.

Mr. Robertson indicated that we had consulted the American companies and had obtained the following information. A Tapline official indicated that his company was considering the transit problem in terms of establishing a separate pipeline company with a published tariff and revenues accruing to the transit countries on a basis of taxation of the profits. While these views have not been one hundred per cent accepted, there were senior officials in each of the parent companies thinking along these lines. Information obtained informally indicated that the British companies in IPC are also considering the transit problem along similar lines. In reply to an inquiry, the Tapline official had responded that while it would be desirable to hold consultations at the management level with the British companies and for the negotiators to consult on the ground during the course of negotiations, his company would be reluctant to follow such a course in view of the risks involved under anti-trust legislation. An official of one of the American participants in IPC had informed us that his company would welcome the opportunity of closer consultation between IPC and Aramco on the transit problem. He did not see how success can be achieved without such cooperation. He believed that chaos may result unless some basis for cooperation is found. He did not feel, however, that the thing suggested by the British could be done in view of the risks involved under the anti-trust laws. Although his company could not cooperate with the British companies in the way proposed, he was hopeful that something constructive could be developed from the British proposal.

Referring to the principle of taxation on profits of a proposed separate pipeline company, Mr. Beeley inquired whether Tapline was considering this matter in terms of the 50-50 principle. Mr. Robertson replied that this item had not been covered in our recent conversations with the American companies but possibly Mr. Eakens could throw some light on the subject. It could be speculated that with the acceptance of the 50-50 principle on oil production the Saudi Arabian Government might logically seek to apply this principle to any separate pipeline company, once the latter is established.

Mr. Beeley then inquired if we were prepared to state our views on the merits of an oil treaty or some form of commodity study group. Mr. Hart asked Mr. Robertson if he would comment on this subject.

Mr. Robertson replied that we had considered informally a number of possible alternatives which could be considered in a study of the matter. They were in the nature of reflecting the thinking of some of the Department officials concerned. They had not been formalized in any way and were not being set forth in any sense of a commitment on the part of the Department of State. In any consideration of some form of multilateral oil treaty containing the general provisions of the Anglo-American Oil Agreement of 1945, we would be confronted with the question of to what extent would the criticisms and opposition to the earlier 1945 agreement prevail today. While the situation may have changed in some respects, it could best be appraised in terms of consulting the industrial and Congressional critics. This we have not done. It might be possible to overcome such criticisms and opposition, for instance, by restricting the terms of reference of a multilateral oil treaty to considering disputes arising between foreign nationals holding oil contractual rights in producing countries and the producing countries concerned. A petroleum commission or council, with the governments of the foreign nationals and the producing countries concerned participating, would be much more limited in scope than the broader terms of reference of the 1945 agreement. Should there be a dispute, for instance, between a producing country and a foreign oil company over whether the company had properly accounted for revenues accruing to the country, the dispute could be referred voluntarily by both parties to the newly established council or commission. This body could arrange to employ competent outside accountants to audit the books of the company under its supervision and report on the result of such an audit. Reference of disputes to the new body should be voluntary on the part of both disputants with suitable provisions against any encroachment on the sovereignty of any producing country or the corporate rights of any foreign oil company. While an oil study group could also be considered, it is doubtful whether an approach such as this without treaty status could be very effective due to the lack of legislative sanction and in view of anti-trust limitations.

Mr. Armstrong observed that the situation concerning oil was different to that which prevailed concerning other commodities for which treaties and study groups had been established or for which agreements had been negotiated. Wheat and sugar were the subject of agreements while cotton, tin, wool and rubber were the subject of international study groups. Large companies were not in the picture in other commodity groups in the way in which they figure in oil, i.e., as operators in the producing countries. The role of the producing countries had been one of sitting back, leaving operations to the companies and demanding increasing revenues. The consuming countries were numerous and the major ones were the homes of the companies which operate in the producing countries. Consumers are so widely scattered and so numerous that few countries could be said to represent an identifiable consumer interest. On the other hand, the consumers of cotton, for instance, were largely the manufacturers who took the raw material and made it into some finished product. There was also the disturbing factor that in the case of oil, U.S. domestic companies had been very much opposed to the establishment of any international body to deal with oil problems. We would be sure to arouse considerable U.S. domestic antagonism and criticism should it become known that a multilateral oil study group or treaty was being considered. Three principal sources of antagonism could be considered as: (1) the coal and domestic petroleum elements who are strenuously opposed to foreign oil imports; (2) anti-trust elements which would undoubtedly view an international oil group as a smoke screen for getting around the limitations of anti-trust legislation; and (3) elements in American business and government who have never shown any particular enthusiasm for international commodity agreements. There was considerable U.S. opposition to the pre-war producers agreements in tin and rubber. There is probably less receptiveness in the new Administration than in the former toward international commodity agreements. Furthermore, the establishment of a study group on oil might complicate within the U.S. current study group arrangements on other commodities such as tin and rubber which could be harmful to both the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Metzger observed that generally he agreed with the observations of Mr. Armstrong. He added he would like to remark particularly on the anti-trust effect of establishing a study group or an oil treaty at the present time. If an oil treaty were negotiated permitting exchange of information within industry, it could have the effect, depending on its terminology, of amending anti-trust legislation in this respect as such a treaty, once ratified, would govern. In the absence of specific legislation for a study group or in a treaty permitting such exchanges of information, the provisions of the anti-trust laws would not be changed. At present there is no specific legislative authority for the participation of the U.S. in commodity study groups. Our ability to regularize this situation might be adversely affected by any public knowledge of plans to establish an oil study group. There is no specific provision in the sugar or wheat agreements for consultations among industry. All exchanges of information are among participating governments and the governments in turn work out their own arrangements for consulting with industry.

Mr. Beeley stated that the Foreign Office takes the view that this is not the time for establishing an international petroleum council. However, his Government welcomes the opportunity of exploring and discussing the matter. His Government's views are based on two fears: (1) anything in the nature of an international oil council would provoke further "ganging up" on the part of the Arab States and pose serious risks; and (2) a body of this kind would tend to be divided into two camps, the producers and the consumers. Furthermore, neither the producers nor the consumers could be counted on to support the broad area of agreement which exists between the governments of the U.S. and the U.K. It might, therefore, become a three-sided affair. He added that in his personal view, it might be desirable to explore further this matter at some time in the future.

Mr. Armstrong observed that should the Arab States go a long ways in establishing a regional organization, amounting to a bloc of governments, there may be some merit in taking defensive action. We could then raise with the Arab States the question of the consumer/producer relationship. Mr. Beeley inquired whether he had in mind establishing an economic commission for the Middle East under ECOSOC such as existed in the Far East. Mr. Armstrong replied that we had not particularly liked the regional economic commission idea in the beginning, but that some of these commissions had done useful work. A general discussion followed in which it was indicated that a proposal for the establishment of an economic commission in the Middle East under ECOSOC, considered in 1948, may have been overcome by events deriving from the Palestine hostilities.

Mr. Metzger stated that, from a legal point of view, there was a disposition against regional adjustment bodies outside and independent of the international court, as they impinged on the prestige of the court. Any proposal to establish another tribunal on a multilateral basis to handle oil disputes might complicate as well as duplicate the work of the international court and detrimentally affect its prestige. The establishment of a regional international court in the Latin American area had been opposed by the United States for the same reasons.

At this point Mr. Eakens observed that the establishment of machinery to handle disputes at a technical level should be more attainable than a general study group in the United States. Most of the difficulties in the past, as in the case of Iran, had arisen out of disputes on concessions. It would, therefore, be advantageous to have some machinery to deal with such disputes at a technical level before they got out of hand. Mr. Beeley interjected that the producing countries might be reluctant to submit disputes arising within their own borders to any international body whose findings may have the effect of impinging on their sovereignty. Mr. Hart stated that he felt this would be the situation in Saudi Arabia. Mr. Eakens continued that the problem of disputes between the oil companies and the producing countries will become more difficult and more serious once the 50–50 principle has been reached. The companies will then have little if any further ground to give in meeting demands for greater payments to the sovereign governments without getting out of line with payments in the other producing states. Because of the limitations on the private companies in dealing with sovereign countries, some machinery might be necessary to cope with this situation.

Mr. Metzger stated that the judicial method for settling disputes was less easy where large groups were arrayed on vital subjects than when the matter was confined to less important matters.

At this point Mr. Hart announced that the Saudi Arabian Government negotiations with Aramco were being postponed from September 24 to a later date at the request of the Saudi Government. Mr. Eakens stated that, according to Aramco, the negotiations were postponed until November at the request of the Saudi Arabian Government.

Turning again to the question of an international oil body, Mr. Armstrong stated that if machinery is set up to ascertain the facts or arbitrate disputes, agreements which at present were between private companies and producing countries would in time be converted to agreements between governments in view of the intercession of the British and American Governments on behalf of their nationals holding contractual rights.

Mr. Beeley stated that the Foreign Office is apprehensive over the application of the 50-50 principle to any division of pipeline profits. He added that it is important that the two types of enterprise not be confused. In production arrangements, the government's part is considerable in that it provides the resources which are the subject of exploration and production, while in pipeline operations the government takes a very small part as it is primarily a matter of moving the oil. In the latter case, the company makes all the effort.

Mr. Hart stated that under the Saudi Arabian Government Income Tax Decree of November 5, 1950 the net profit of companies operating in Saudi Arabia is taxed at a rate of twenty per cent. Under another Income Tax Decree promulgated on December 26, 1950, an additional income tax is levied on companies engaged in the production of petroleum or other hydrocarbons. Under the latter, the rate is fifty per cent of the net operating profits of such companies, less all other payments to the Saudi Government, thus making the effective rate on Aramco fifty per cent. Under Tapline's concession, Tapline is exempted from all tax levies for the duration of the concession agreement, but at the end of fifteen years is committed to the payment of a reasonable transit fee at least as favorable to Saudi Arabia as payments by Tapline or any other pipeline to any other Middle East country, taking into account mileage and through-put.

Mr. Eakens observed that under the IPC arrangement with Iraq, half the profit between the well and border prices was split with the Government. This situation would not be affected if Aramco made a similar concession in Saudi Arabia. Furthermore, the United States Government subjects its pipeline companies to a fifty-two per cent tax as a part of the general tax structure. It would, of course, be better if the foreign countries concerned enacted general income tax measures rather than single out the oil companies for special taxes. Mr. Beeley observed that there would be no objection to general tax laws or if all exactions from the pipeline companies amounted to fifty per cent. However, his Government was opposed to special laws applying the 50-50 principle to the profits of the pipeline companies.

A general discussion followed in which it was pointed out that IPC and Aramco pay special charges for police protection and other services. However, IPC pays a rather small charge for police protection over and above the 50-50 split with Iraq, while Aramco contribution for this service is computed as a part of the 50-50.

At this point Mr. Eakens observed that the oil companies have put themselves in a special position and made themselves vulnerable to being singled out for special exactions by having negotiated transit concessions under which they have tax immunity. The oil companies probably will continue to be singled out so long as they are not willing to give up this special position. This might be a matter to be explored with the companies.

Mr. Beeley concluded that the discussions at this point seemed to have exhausted the agenda. He hoped that it might be possible to consider a meeting at least once every three months to review the Middle East oil situation. He inquired whether it would be possible to meet once more to tidy up loose ends and to consider the desirability of a quarterly review. It was agreed that the final session of the current talks be held on Thursday, October 1, at 3 p.m., in the NEA conference room.

Mr. Hart opened the meeting by remarking that this last session of the current U.S./U.K. talks on Middle East oil was for the purpose of tidying up loose ends on the various problems covered. He felt that the talks had been both profitable and useful. The Department would be happy to review the Middle East oil situation periodically. Referring to a request made by Mr. Beeley at the last session, he expressed the thought that we might hold the periodic talks once every six months with the understanding that special arrangements could be made to hold discussions more frequently if warranted by any particular important development. He added that we were gratified with the way in which the talks had progressed and wished to refer particularly to two developments. First, it seemed to him that the talks had been most useful in seeking further ways of establishing a relationship of confidence between the two governments. Second, he appreciated the thoughts advanced on the avoidance of "ganging up" on the part of our two governments against the Arab States concerned. He added that it had been most useful that the principles upon which action might be guided had been and could continue to be considered. Furthermore, a by-product of the talks may be a more systematic consultation with the oil companies concerned on both sides.

[1] Drafted by Robertson.

Mr. Beeley replied that his Government appreciated the time and thought given to these talks. As a consequence, he had been able to encourage his Government in London that the two governments were working along similar lines. While his instructions had been to seek periodic talks on a quarterly basis, he believed that his Government would be agreeable to holding meetings once each six months, particularly in view of the understanding that additional discussions could be arranged when necessary. According to this arrangement, the two governments could schedule the next regular talk for March or April of 1954. [2] Meanwhile, the problem of public relations between the companies on the one hand and the producing and transit countries on the other, and the type of contribution which our two governments might be able to make in this field, could be explored. The emergence of the Iranian oil industry was a development that should be watched.

Mr. Hart stated that Ambassador Moose, who was back from Syria on consultations in the Department, had made certain suggestions in respect to the transit problem. Ambassador Moose had indicated that he is impressed with the frailty of any profit sharing arrangement under which the oil companies make pipeline payments. He believes the 50–50 profit sharing plan is both unsound in principle and dangerous in practice. The only principle which the transit countries recognize is the principle of getting larger and larger payments from the pipelines. Should the profit sharing principle be admitted, it might well turn out to be a step toward nationalization such as occurred in Iran; it might well inspire parallel demands on foreign companies engaged in air or sea transportation which serve ports or airports in the Near East; it could inspire the Government of Egypt to invoke the profit sharing principle in order to share the savings of tankers passing through the Suez Canal. If the local government is able to impose 50-50 profit sharing, there is no obvious point, short of the capacity of the company to pay, where further increases in the government's demands can be halted. A 50-50 division has no more innate value than 60-40, 75-25 or any other ratio. The calculation of the profits to be divided, whatever the proportionate share, is sure to be a thorny problem. A more desirable course would be one embodying a principle which could be defended by the pipeline companies and which the U.S. Government could better support. A suggested course would be for the pipeline companies to propose, when the pressure for a new arrangement becomes irresistable, and push a counter plan to demands for profit sharing, offering to give up their special positions of tax immunity in return for "national treatment" whereby their property and income would be taxed at a rate no higher than that applied to local firms and their obligations and rights would be those of a domestic business concern. The highest currently applicable tax rate in Syria is thirty-six per cent. We have under consideration in Syria a FCN treaty calling for national treatment.

Mr. Butler responded that he thought it would be extremely wise that the oil companies fit into the general tax structure of the Arab States. He added that he was under the impression that Aramco and IPC had been thinking along these lines. Mr. Eakens observed that the oil companies were thinking in terms of some form of taxation, but exactly what form was not yet clear. However, he added that giving up their tax immunity would involve a major decision by the oil companies.

Mr. Armstrong pointed out that if the tax principle were to be considered, it might be well to examine how changes in the law could be made in respect to oil company payments. Tax laws, for instance, could be changed by the governments unilaterally without any consultation with the oil companies. On the other hand, if the oil companies held valid agreements with the government, presumably the agreements would be changed only as a result of bilateral negotiations. To this observation Mr. Metzger added that once you stake out national treatment as the standard of treatment, the oil companies would get no better or no worse treatment than the nationals of the countries concerned.

Mr. Eakens mentioned certain risks involved in accepting the principle of taxation as had been demonstrated in Venezuela. In that country, a tax law enacted on December 31 of 1947 or 1948 under the guise of a generally applicable tax, retroactive to the beginning of the year, had cost the oil companies some thirty million dollars in additional taxes without a single Venezuelan enterprise paying the tax. He added that Syrian tax levies on IPC would be larger than on Tapline, assuming profits are commensurate with transit distance and volume of oil transported.

Mr. Butler expressed the thought that the oil companies might find lesser risk deriving from increased taxation once the principle were established than on any arbitrary division like the 50-50 profit sharing. There would be great pressure on the part of the transit states to exceed the 50-50 ratio once revenues began to decline in order to maintain revenues at peak levels. A precedent had already been set in Iraq by IPC which had accepted the 50-50 principle on the profits of the pipelines between the wells and the Iraq-Syrian border.

At this point Mr. Beeley interjected that while the principle of taxation might be acceptable to Syria in respect to transit payments, Lebanon might object in view of the short transit distance across that country. To this Mr. Armstrong added that we have not succeeded in negotiating FCN treaties with any of the Arab States. We have, however, negotiated treaties with certain other countries in the Middle East such as Greece, Israel and Ethiopia.

Mr. Eakens stated that the fact that the oil companies enjoy tax immunity makes them vulnerable to being singled out for increased demands by the governments concerned. We might, therefore, discuss with the oil companies the question of whether they would be willing to accept the principle of taxation which would involve their giving up the tax immunity they currently enjoy. To this Mr. Beeley added that if separate pipeline companies are established, there may be less resistance to giving up tax immunity on the part of the oil companies concerned. Mr. Robertson suggested that this might be a decision for the companies to make.

At this point Mr. Metzger observed that the historical record regarding the ability of governments to support their nationals in respect of heavy taxation by other states shows that certain difficulties had been encountered. International law principles in the tax field were weaker than in other fields. If the taxes were not confiscatory or discriminating in nature, the government would not be standing on very solid ground. Consequently, when considering standing for national treatment on tax matters, it may look better in principle than it actually is in practice.

Mr. Hart observed that there is no easy solution for the transit problem as, on the other hand, the governments in the Middle East had not made a very good record in respect to recognizing the validity of existing contracts.

Mr. Metzger continued that there were other factors in the field of taxation that should be kept in mind. Foreigners domiciled here are treated on the same basis as Americans with a few notable exceptions. One exception is that domiciled foreigners are subjected to withholdings ranging from twenty-two per cent upward; while non-domiciled foreigners are subjected to withholdings ranging from thirty per cent upward. More important for the problem at hand, however, is that classifications can be made which provide certain differentiations on objectively reasonable bases without being considered discriminatory. Congress had said, for instance, that where employers have eight or more employees, they must pay social security tax; there was no requirement for a tax for employers who had less than eight employees. The courts have held that this and similar classifications are permissible, despite the fact that differences in treatment result. Classification applies in a very wide area. It would be very difficult for foreign nationals to attack differentiations under such classifications.

Mr. Armstrong stated that the Syrians could enact tax measures for all pipelines in the country at a rate of sixty per cent or more. The fact that IPC and Tapline were the only pipelines in the country would not enable our government to protect the companies on a basis of national treatment. Mr. Eakens added that this kind of precedent had already been established in Saudi Arabia where a fifty per cent income tax was levied only on oil producing companies.

At this point Mr. Hart suggested that we might turn our attention to how oil companies might bring about better understanding of Western enterprise on the part of the Arab governments and thus endeavor to make friends in the area. It was observed that the efforts of the oil companies to date had yielded limited results. Mr. Armstrong suggested that we look into the information activities conducted by our governments to see if they were contributing in the most effective way toward the problems under discussion. At the same time, we should avoid getting the government in a position of being adjuncts to oil company operations.

Mr. Beeley observed that the policy of the British Embassy in Iraq has been to avoid any impression that British Government media participated directly in this field. British Embassy officials there advised the oil companies on how they might handle their information programs most effectively. Furthermore, they encouraged the Development Board to publicize how the monies derived from oil revenues were being spent in useful ways.

Mr. Armstrong then mentioned that we might also continue our thinking and study concerning the merits of an oil study group or international agreement and review this matter at future meetings with the British.

The Chargé in Saudi Arabia (Jones) to the Department of State

SECRET JIDDA, October 11, 1953.

No. 142

Ref: Department's Memorandum of Conversation July 28, 1953, "Aramco Negotiating Plans." [1]

Subject: Aramco's "New Proposals".

As the result of a request from Crown Prince Saud that Aramco submit for Government study, prior to resumption of formal discussions on November 8, an outline of the Company's recently determined position regarding oil pricing, Aramco has addressed to Prince Feisal a letter summarizing its so-called "new proposals." [2] Mr. Garry Owen, the Company's Representative to the Saudi Arabian Government, has informed the Embassy of the provisions of this letter, dated October 6, requesting, however, that dissemination of this information be limited to officers of the Department in Washington.

Under the terms of the letter in question, Aramco undertakes to bill offtakers for all deliveries for export on the basis of posted price at Ras Tanura (presently $1.97) provided, however, that Aramco will accept billings (i.e., deductions from posted price) from offtaking companies for actual selling expenses. While these expenses vary somewhat, they are estimated at present at approximately two percent of published price.

In making this proposal, which is to supersede previous suggestions with regard to assimilation of Tapline properties within Saudi Arabia, Aramco's letter specifies that the Company "anticipates" that the Government will agree to the following:

[2] At the time of preparation of this despatch this letter had not yet been delivered. It was anticipated, however, that delivery would be effected in the very near future. [Footnote in the source text.

[Despatch 148 from Jidda, Oct. 18, reported that the Aramco letter had been delivered to Prince Faisal on Oct. 14. (886A.2553/10-1853) Despatch 1217 from Paris, Nov. 3, reported a conversation between the Petroleum Attaché at the Embassy and Lewis McNaughton regarding recent discussions between McNaughton and the Saudi Arabian Minister of Finance at Versailles. The discussion had centered on the sales prices of crude oil as they affected the 50/50 agreement on profits between Aramco and the Saudi Arabian Government. (886A.2553/11-353)]

1) Adjustment of Tapline's outstanding claims for customs charges;
2) Increased acceptance of non-dollar currencies, particularly Sterling;
3) Acceptance of the Company's income declarations for the years 1950, 1951 and 1952, 1953's return to be prepared on the same basis, adjusted only as increased billings to offtakers may commence;
4) Tax immunity of Aramco stockholders, offtakers and all others participating in export of the Company's products;
5) Adjustments for gravity and stabilization;
6) "Some understanding" regarding the other outstanding questions raised by the Government in January, 1952.

It will be noted that the stipulations enumerated above, constituting Aramco's quid pro quo for increasing its payments to the Government by an estimated $50,000,000 a year, include virtually every major point of disagreement between the two parties.

Editoral Note

On October 21, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John D. Jernegan sent letters to the Embassies in Amman, Baghdad, Beirut, Cairo, Damascus, Jidda, London, and Tehran enclosing an NEA Staff Study on an International Treaty in Respect to Middle East Oil Disputes. The study, dated October 16, suggested a multilateral oil treaty restricted in purpose and membership to providing a forum at a governmental technical level designed to facilitate settlement of disputes arising between the oil-producing states of the Middle East and foreign nationals holding oil contractual rights in those states. The letters to the Embassies, dated October 21, asked their views and comments on the enclosed staff study as soon as possible, so that the Department of State might then proceed to confer with other interested agencies in the Executive Branch. It requested the Embassies to consider, among other matters, whether the proposed treaty would be acceptable to the Near Eastern states concerned, and whether the oil companies would like it. The study suggested that a treaty having suitable provisions against any encroachment on the sovereignty of any producing country and providing for a reference of disputes to an international oil commission on a voluntary basis might tend to counter the objection that the producing countries would be reluctant to submit disputes arising within their own borders to an international body whose findings would have the effect of impinging on sovereignty. As far as the oil companies were concerned, when a Departmental position had been determined, the Department planned to consult the companies on an informal basis to see whether the proposal was acceptable to them.

The letters to the Embassies and staff study are in Department of State file 880.2553/10-1653. A summary of the replies from the Embassies is in the memorandum by Byroade, Document 325.

Despatch 80 from Jidda, August 16, informed the Department of State that the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Aramco went to Jidda on August 15 for discussions with the Crown Prince and Minister of Finance. He informed them that Aramco's new price proposals were ready, and the company was prepared to resume negotiations at the convenience of the Saudi Arabian Government, provided Aramco was given 2 week's notice to enable company officials to make the trip from New York. Telegrams 101 from Jidda, September 10; 120, September 23; and 125, September 26, reported first that Prince Faisal wanted to reconvene the negotiations on September 24 and Aramco had agreed; then the Saudi Arabian Government postponed them, and finally that negotiations would begin again on November 8. According to telegram 195 from Jidda, November 1, the Saudi Arabians requested the discussions be postponed to December 8; and telegram 268 from Jidda, December 8, reported the pricing discussions had again been put off, probably until late in January. (King ibn Saud died on November 9, 1953.) Additional information on the discussions between Aramco and the Saudi Arabian Government on oil pricing is in Department of State file 886A.2553.

Despatch 126 from Jidda, September 29, reported a disturbing degree of labor unrest among Aramco employees in Dhahran. A number of anti-Aramco petitions being circulated in the area had come to the attention of the Crown Prince, who had then appointed a governmental committee of investigation. Despatch 143 from Jidda, October 11, reported the committee had arrived in Dhahran and had begun its investigation. Despatch 145 from Kuwait, November 15, told the Department of State of reports it had heard that the new King Saud and Prince Faisal were incensed by the attitude of Aramco during the recent strike and resented what they considered Aramco's policy of keeping Saudi Arabs from obtaining responsible positions in the company. Despatch 190 from Jidda, November 19, reported the Saudi Arabian Government was irritated by a report that Aramco had indicated to the press that the Dhahran strike had been directed against the government, rather than the company. The Embassy feared the ill will aroused by Aramco press statements would continue to plague its relations with the government. Documentation is in Department of State file 886A.2553.

The Chargé in France (Achilles) to the Department of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL PARIS, November 30, 1953—5 p. m.

2099. I. Charpentier, Director General of Economic side of Foreign Office, in informal conversation with Labouisse, stated that French officials were pre-occupied with certain aspects of the world petroleum problem. He expressed particular concern over recent talks between Aramco and Saudi Arabia, without apparently knowing precise nature of those talks. He also expressed concern as to effects surplus supplies will have on prices. He said that Bonnet had been instructed to discuss matter with Department.

II. The particular points discussed by Charpentier fall roughly into three categories:

a. Iranian Oil. Present French concern here is that they be included in any conversations relating to possible cutbacks in other areas in event Iran production resumed. He said he had talked matter over with British, expressing view that this question should be discussed on "governmental level" and that British had agreed. Charpentier suggested that US, UK, French and Netherlands governments were those who should "put heads together."

b. Modification of structure of companies. Charpentier suggested possibility that events would necessitate some reconstitution of the structures of international oil companies in the Middle East. He apparently has in mind the possibility of single entity in each Middle East producing country which would own the oil, refining and distributions facilities, which ownership would be shared presumably by producing country and the international petroleum companies. He said this was only tentative thinking on his part but that matter of structure of companies would certainly have to be discussed and French would like to be in on discussions. His reason for suggesting some structural modifications was that we would be "eaten to bits" by the producing countries if the off-takers could not get together. He realized anti-trust problem for US would make it all more important that matter be handled on governmental level.

[1] Repeated to London.

c. Soviet Offers. Charpentier mentioned facts that Soviets have agreed to furnish French 400 thousand tons crude from Baku; that Finns had asked whether French wanted one million tons Russian oil; that Soviets had recently offered sell gasoline to France against payment in Austrian schillings (Charpentier said French had refused offer; he also requested that information re this offer be closely held); and that Soviets offering oil to Italy and certain South American countries. He feels that entry of Soviets in world petroleum picture emphasizes the need for inter-governmental discussions among US, UK, French and Netherlands.

III. Wish to emphasize that Charpentier approach very informal and apparently unofficial. Gather that any official approach in hands of French Embassy Washington. If Department has been approached by French Embassy, we would appreciate receiving comments. [2]

On Dec. 3, the French Embassy was informed that the Department of State would be glad to discuss the matter with them on a bilateral basis, since such talks had recently been held with the British. The Ambassador in Lebanon (Hare) to the Department of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL BEIRUT, December 18, 1953.

531. Prime Minister Yafi asked me call this morning and raised question of renegotiation of unratified IPC agreement (Embtel 518, December 11). [2] Said he had previously taken up with British and

[2] Not printed; it reported the Government of Lebanon had been corresponding with Tapline and IPC, requesting new negotiations of the May 1952 agreements and asking the companies to get in touch with the Minister of Finance. Neither company planned to contact him. (883A.2553/12-1153)

French and also intended doing so with Dutch because of various national interests involved. Following is summary of Yafi's presentation:

1) He wished confine his remarks to IPC and not speak now of Tapline, with which relations had been generally better. Believed also that, if satisfactory agreement could be reached with IPC, should not be difficult come to understanding with Tapline.

2) He realized there had been much intemperate and irresponsible discussion of pipeline question in press and in Chamber of Deputies; wished make clear that this was not impelling force but rather that 1952 agreement had been concluded by people who had not taken the public interest adequately into account. The agreement was consequently one which the present government could not and would not put before the Chamber of Deputies for ratification.

3) Governments succeeding that of Sami Solh had violently opposed the 1952 agreement. Present government also opposes but wishes make clear desire cooperate and not intimidate. If some reasonable compromise is to be reached, IPC would find present government reasonable and Yafi would personally undertake to obtain legislative acceptance.

4) Matter has been talked over generally with the Syrians, with whom Lebanese intend making common cause.

5) GOL has no specific plan to put forward at this time. Personally, Yafi is dubious about the 50-50 idea which George Hakim so strongly championed but there might be something to be said for a plan which would take into consideration the reduced purchasing power of receipts since the agreement of 1931 was signed. In any event, some new and defensible basis for payment should be found.

6) If GOL is to combat communism, it must do something to alleviate the lot of the needy, which now is both serious and dangerous. Lebanon does not need money to balance its regular budget but it does need money for social betterment; this also is in the interest of its Western friends.

7) Yafi hoped these views would be transmitted to the US Government in the expectation that it would counsel the American participants in IPC to adopt a more understanding attitude. The GOL had spoken to IPC in friendly terms; the latter should, however, understand that the GOL was serious and would not tolerate further refusal to discuss.

I observed that this was first time this matter had been raised with me and I would not undertake to discuss in detail. However, I would venture observe that, although true that 1952 agreement had not been ratified, the fact remained that it had been reached after due discussion and had been signed by the then government. I knew of nothing which had happened in the meantime to change the basic situation on which agreement had been reached. Also, although I appreciated the desirable purposes which the government wished to serve by increasing its revenue, it seemed clear to me that an agreement of this kind was essentially a business transaction and it would therefore be inappropriate to approach the company on the basis of need unrelated to the service being rendered. Furthermore, the government's request must remain somewhat nebulous in the absence of any specific recommendations or proposals. However, I appreciated the friendly way in which the Prime Minister had raised the question and would report to my government as requested by him.

Just prior to my talk with Yafi, I met with British and French Ambassadors who indicated that Yafi had approached them along same lines as reported above. British Ambassador added that, although he had not given Yafi any comfort aside from saying he would report to his government, he personally felt, and had recommended to London, that serious considerations should be given to encouraging IPC to renew negotiations since he felt that continuance of present situation was intolerable and that, aside from IPC itself, British interests generally were being adversely affected. He mentioned thought which had been given to finding some new and logical basis for pipeline payments and said he felt the road to solution was in that direction. Also he definitely felt that the present government would be more amenable to reasonable dealing than any other which might be expected to replace it. The French Ambassador expressed himself in almost identical terms except for making the point that, in his opinion, an unhealthy situation was developing between the oil rich countries of the Near East and their proletarian and oil-less neighbors; there should be some degree of sharing in oil profits.

I shall submit my comments on foregoing in a following message.[3]

First Meeting, December 18, 1953, 10:00 a.m.

Mr. Hart opened the discussion by welcoming the French delegation and extending the greetings of Secretary Byroade and his deputy Mr. Jernegan. He then gave M. Clauzel an opportunity to make some opening comments.

M. Clauzel replied he welcomed the chance to hold these discussions, noting that he understood they were to be open and informal. He then outlined the Middle East oil policy problems of particular concern to France. He stressed the importance of Middle East oil to the French economy and the vital interest that the French have in future developments concerning that oil. M. Clauzel recalled that up to now the oil companies have taken the leading roles in negotiations with the producing countries. He believed that the oil companies have been at a considerable disadvantage in not being able to cooperate with each other and to exchange information whereas the Arab countries are cooperating more closely on oil matters. M. Clauzel continued by emphasizing that the negotiations of any company operating in the Middle East have a direct bearing on the interests of all the other companies in that area. He mentioned to illustrate this point the effect that Aramco's 50-50 concession with Saudi Arabia had on both the IPC in Iraq and the AIOC in Iran. M. Clauzel concluded by stressing again the great importance to both France and Western Europe of having sufficient supplies of Middle Eastern oil at a reasonable price.

M. Clauzel then listed the following items that he believed might profitably be discussed during the meetings:

delegations, and advised that, since the discussions were completely informal in character and no official agreements had been reached, it was considered desirable that no publicity be given to the fact that the discussions had taken place. (880.2553/12-3153)

1. The possibility of the Middle East oil companies collaborating more closely concerning their negotiations with the ruling countries.
2. Problems that will be faced with the reappearance of Iranian oil on the markets.
3. The effects that Soviet Bloc oil might have if it is sold in Western Europe.
4. The possible future trends of oil prices.

To give the general background of the problems, M. Blancard outlined briefly the importance of oil supplies to the French economy. France and North Africa are currently consuming oil at the rate of 15,000,000 tons per year, almost all of which comes from the Middle East. Consumption of oil in France is now almost three times that of 1938. M. Blancard estimated that it will increase at the rate of 7 or 8 per cent a year and will double by 1962. He concluded that because of this rapidly increasing consumption and a weak foreign currency balance, France has a need for large supplies of cheap oil.

M. Blancard continued by noting that France now imports 23 million tons of crude annually, 93 per cent of which comes from the Middle East. Of this total, 17 million is for domestic use, from which 15 million tons of products are derived. The remaining 6 million tons are refined for re-export. The crude comes mainly from Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Iraq supplies about one-half of France's crude consumption, or between 8 and 9 million tons a year. Kuwait supplies 5 million tons and Saudi Arabia 2 million tons a year. Of the amount imported, about 4 million tons a year are supplied by American companies.

M. Blancard then explained that the net expense in foreign currencies for petroleum imports is $170,000,000. Of this total net expense, $60,000,000 is in dollars and $110,000,000 in pounds sterling. He stated, however, that currently sterling oil costs less in foreign currency. This is true in spite of the fact that France pays for only 60 per cent of its dollar oil in dollars, while it has to pay for all of its sterling oil in pounds. M. Blancard explained that payments for exports, freight costs and refinery costs have to be taken into account in arriving at a net cost figure. Since the shutdown of Abadan, a large amount of sterling oil has been refined in France and the products exported. M. Blancard, however, did not think that this situation can be expected to continue. As for transportation costs which are a large factor in the cost of oil supplies, M. Blancard explained 80 per cent of the freight for sterling crude is payable in francs, while only 60 per cent of the freight of American crude is payable in francs.

M. Blancard then traced the recent price levels in the Middle East to show that the prices have a tendency to continually rise. He stated that at the end of World War II the price of 36° API crude oil in the Middle East was $1.00 a barrel. Prices then rose until by 1948 they reached $2.20 a barrel. The ECA, however, forced the level down to $1.75 a barrel. M. Blancard said that as he had expected the price to drop still further, he was very surprised when the prices rose again last July. This rise occurred shortly after the American oil companies raised the price 25 cents a barrel in the United States. M. Blancard believed that increasing prices of oil were due to the fact that the Arab oil countries by cooperating had an advantage in negotiating with the oil companies.

M. Blancard noted that the American oil companies stated they were unable to meet with the other companies to reach agreement on their negotiating positions because of the Sherman Act. Therefore, he noted the Sherman Act, which is supposed to lead to lower competitive prices, actually in this case leads to higher prices. He stated this fact could have serious consequences for France.

M. Clauzel requested at this point that the Department give its views towards the Sherman Act as it affects the American oil companies' ability to meet and discuss common problems with other companies. He noted that American companies were now meeting in London to discuss Iranian oil and wondered how this was possible under the Act.

Mr. Armstrong replied to the latter point by stating that AIOC had invited the companies to London to talk about possible arrangements for marketing Iranian oil. The Department of Justice advised them, at their request, that there was no objection to their accepting an invitation from the AIOC to have preliminary informal discussions regarding the Iranian oil problem, provided that Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr., Consultant to the Secretary of State, would be present at the discussions. Mr. Armstrong referred also to the provisions of the Defense Productivity Act (Sec. 708) relating to exemptions of voluntary agreements and programs from antitrust laws, but he added that such exemptions would require the approval of the President and would be only temporary expiring with the Act.

As to the general question of the ability of American companies to consult and make agreements with other companies, Mr. Armstrong stated that it was his understanding that the American companies can and do exchange information and views. However, they must depend on their own judgment as to how far they can go. The Government won't advise the companies in advance maintaining that it is up to the courts to decide whether or not an arrangement is in violation of the Act or not. However, the companies have numerous court judgments as precedents on which to base their decisions. Mr. Czyzak confirmed Mr. Armstrong's explanation as to the American companies' position under the Sherman Act. Mr. Armstrong added that he believed that the companies have usually kept each other reasonably well informed concerning Middle East developments.

M. Blanchard replied that many times information is received too late. He gave as an example Aramco's offer to the Saudi Government to drop the 32 cents per barrel discount to 4 cent per barrel. Three weeks later (November 21) Iraq made the same demand on the IPC.

Mr. Armstrong stated that it is the Department's view that because of the Venezuelan 50-50 agreement, it is only a question of time before the same type of arrangements will take effect in the Middle East. Currently there does not exist a true 50-50 sharing in the Middle East since the arrangement is now based on a discounted price for the crude instead of market prices.

M. Clauzel made several comments concerning the Aramco-Saudi negotiations. He noted that there are two points to be negotiated: the price on which the 50-50 agreement is to be based, and whether the new arrangement is to be retroactive to 1950. He remarked that the French much preferred the royalty payments to the 50-50 type agreement, but now believe there is no alternative to the 50-50 principle. M. Clauzel did not believe that Aramco's offer to reduce the discount from 32 cents per barrel to 2 per cent or 4 cents per barrel would represent a "true 50-50" but more nearly a 55-45 arrangement. He observed that France is opposed to the retroactive feature on the grounds that it would prejudice the principle of the stability of agreements.

Mr. Blancard explained the French position in more detail. He first noted that there is now no alternative to the 50-50 principle. However, he pointed out that under it there will be a tendency for prices to rise but strong resistance to any necessary reductions. This is due to rulers of the oil producing countries opposing any reductions in the price of crude. For example, he stated, the Iraq Government protested the 10 cents per barrel reduction put in effect last March. M. Blancard observed that there may have to be a decrease in the price of Middle East oil if Iranian oil and Russian oil enter the markets.

Mr. Blancard stated that he believed valid reasons existed for basing the 50-50 sharing of profits on discounted prices rather than on the posted prices. While admitting that the 32 cents a barrel discount was too high he considered that a discount of at least 10 cents per barrel could be justified.

Second Meeting, December 18, 1953, 3:00 p. m.

The discussions resumed with M. Blancard continuing his justification of the necessity of basing the 50-50 arrangements on a discounted price. He noted that the companies producing oil in the Middle East must continually find new markets for their greatly increased production. This is a difficult problem for those companies without large established markets able to absorb the increases. It is absolutely necessary for these companies to give discounts to dispose of their large surpluses of oil. M. Blancard illustrated this point by citing the discount that Gulf allows Shell under their long-term contract and also the similar discount allowed by AIOC to Petrofina Belge. M. Blancard concluded that CFP is thus justified in receiving a discount from IPC for the crude it markets in France. Also CFP must offer a discount to move its surplus crude onto other markets. For such crude, a profit sharing arrangement based on posted prices would not be a true 50-50 arrangement as the net return accruing to CFP is not the posted price but the discounted price.

Mr. Eakens replied by stating that the Department did not advise Aramco on the matter of reducing the current discount, but it would now seem impossible for Aramco to withdraw its offer to reduce the discount to 2 per cent. In any event, Mr. Eakens continued, there seem to be some arguments for basing the 50-50 arrangements on the posted prices. The posted price is a public figure that is not dependent on accounting procedures for its computation. This would tend to make its acceptance easier for all parties. Probably actual sales prices which are used in Venezuela would be a better base but if large amounts of oil are sold in the Middle East under the posted price, the posted price would tend to drop.

Mr. Eakens stated that he believed a distinction should be drawn between the discount taken by IPC and that taken by Aramco. The IPC negotiated its discount with the Iraq Government and the Government was therefore explicitly aware of its existence. However, this was not true in the Saudi-Aramco agreement. Here the agreement was made on the basis of Aramco's selling price with the discount not specifically negotiated.

M. Blancard replied that the posted price is a retail price or the price at which spot sales and single cargoes are sold; that large amounts of oil sold under long-term contracts almost inevitably are priced below the posted price.

M. Blancard then turned the discussion to the retroactive feature of Saudi Arabia's demands. He reiterated the French position that acceptance of this demand would be an unfortunate breach of the principle of stability of contracts. He observed that acceptance would also carry the implication that the companies had not dealt fairly with the countries in the past. This would be especially unfortunate for IPC at this time since the company's relations with the Government have been very friendly and satisfactory. M. Blancard was apprehensive lest this implication would add force to the ever present demand for nationalization. Also, he stated, if the IPC was forced to make retroactive payments, CFP's share of the payment would approximate $25,000,000. M. Blancard expressed the opinion that a lump sum payment of this type would cause difficulties for CFP. M. Blancard continued by noting the oil companies operate under widely varying fiscal laws that might give each a different viewpoint towards retroactive payments. The French laws are such that CFP could not receive credit against past taxes for retroactive payments. He concluded by posing two questions. Will Aramco accept the demand for retroactive payment? And, if so, what would be Aramco's status under U.S. fiscal laws?

In answer to the first question, Mr. Eakens stated that it is our understanding that Aramco will resist Saudi demands and negotiate the best settlement possible in the circumstances. Mr. Czyzak agreed to inquire as to the answer to the second question and report at a later meeting.[1]

M. Maillard at this point put forward the additional consideration that such large retroactive payments would tend to aggravate the unbalanced situation existing in the Middle East between the producing and non-producing countries. He cited the fact that of the $500 million a year payments to the Middle East countries, only $20 million went to the transit countries and the remaining $480 million went to the producing companies. M. Clauzel stated this would aggravate the already unbalanced conditions and tend to increase the difficulties being faced by both IPC and Tapline in their attempts to negotiate with the transit countries.

M. Clauzel began discussion of the transit problem by setting forth the French views. He noted that under the terms of the Barcelona Convention the use of a country's territory for the transit of goods should be free, except for small service charges. Thus, the 50-50 principle should not apply to transit payments. He stated that the negotiations of one company will have important effects on the position of the other company and expressed concern lest either weaken. M. Clauzel concluded that to abridge the principle of free transit would create a dangerous precedent which might have serious effects elsewhere in the world. He cited the possibility that the Egyptian Government might in the future seek to levy substantial tolls on the traffic through the Suez Canal should such a precedent be created by the pipe line companies.

Mr. Armstrong stated that there is good reason to pay for the movement of oil through pipe lines on the same basis as freight is ordinarily paid, that is on tonnage and mileage. He reported that in discussions with representatives of both Tapline and the American members of IPC, efforts had been made to encourage them to give careful thought as to where their negotiations were leading. From all indications, Mr. Armstrong reported, neither Tapline nor IPC is considering making concessions.

Mr. Eakens mentioned that there was a precedent in the U.S. which should be given consideration. There is a pipe line running from Portland to Montreal through which Venezuelan oil is run. The U.S. treats the portion lying within its borders the same as any other corporation and taxes its profits at the current 52 per cent rate. One possibility would be to separate the producing and pipe line operations in the Middle East and then to have profits accruing to the pipe lines taxed in each country at the tax rates applicable to all other companies. The danger in such a course is that taxes which on the face were non-discriminatory but which in fact were discriminatory might be levied against the companies.

In answer to a question by M. Maillard, Mr. Eakens replied that the companies do not thus far seem to have adhered to any principle in their transit negotiations. Payments currently being made consist of loading fees, transit fees and security payments. They also include a lump sum payment to each transit country because it is not taking the 200,000 tons of oil annually which it is entitled to purchase at world prices. The companies seem to be divided between whether to offer to pay a fee based on the ton-mile principle or whether to negotiate a lump sum payment for the right of transit.

Mr. Hart inquired whether the French had done any thinking on what position the companies should take if their refusals to renegotiate are fruitless.

M. Blancard answered that they were strongly opposed to any type of profit-sharing arrangement. If it is necessary to increase the payments to the transit countries, then it should be done using the current system of payments and merely increasing the amounts.

Mr. Eakens concluded the discussions for the afternoon with the observation that the IPC by basing their 50-50 agreement with Iraq on the border price of $1.84 per barrel may have set a difficult precedent. Sharing the profits on the basis of the border price in effect means that the company is now sharing with Iraq that part of the profits resulting from the transportation of Iraq oil from the oil fields to the border, which is a substantial part of the distance to the loading ports.

Third Meeting, December 21, 1953, 10:00 a. m.

Mr. Czyzak began the meeting by reporting that under the U.S. income tax laws a taxpayer may amend his returns covering the past three years. Thus, if Aramco agrees to make retroactive payments to Saudi Arabia, it may amend its returns for the past three years to take account of the adjustments made to the Saudi Government. Whether or not the claims would be allowed, would be for the Bureau of Internal Revenue or the courts to decide.

Mr. Eakens then resumed discussion of the transit problem by making the following observations. The Department has as yet an open mind on a solution to the transit problem but believes it important eventually to arrive at a sound and defensible basis of payments. Mr. Eakens questioned whether the pipe line transit problem can be considered merely that of moving a commodity in transit across the countries involved. The pipe line companies in fact are operating businesses with a large capital investment within the transit countries and would seem to be fairly comparable to the position of railroads except that they are performing the service of transportation only for themselves. One possibility would be for the pipe line companies to be incorporated as separate entities which would negotiate with the governments as internal business enterprises rather than as shippers moving goods through their territory.

Mr. Armstrong recalled that in the past work had been done internationally on transit problems. However, he did not believe that heretofore pipe lines had been considered as a means of transit. Therefore, he stated, it might be necessary to examine the pipe line problem as it relates to other transit problems. He noted in regard to the suggestion that pipe lines be operated as internal business enterprises, that this would necessitate giving up the tax free arrangements, thus exposing the companies to the risk of discriminatory tax laws. Although, if such were the case, the U.S. would undoubtedly make representations.

Mr. Czyzak explained that discrimination is only considered to exist in situations where individuals or companies are penalized because of their nationality. If the tax laws were drafted to be applicable to all, but, in fact, only applied to pipe line companies, a problem would arise as to whether that could be proved to be discrimination.

M. Blancard, in reply to a question from Mr. Gay, agreed that it was unfortunate that the profit-sharing arrangement between IPC and Iraq was based on the border price of crude. He stated that the well head price would have been a more fortunate choice. However, M. Blancard did not believe that this need be taken as a precedent for the nonproducing countries. He held that the situations were quite different as between producing and transit countries. He agreed there was some justification for a 50–50 arrangement in a producing country, in that its irreplaceable natural resources are being depleted. However, he did not believe any justification existed for sharing profits with a transit country. M. Blancard again mentioned the danger that any profit sharing solution might be used as an unfortunate precedent by other countries that control strategic transit routes such as the Suez Canal. He concluded by adding that to admit the profit sharing principle as applicable to the pipe line problem would be to create another barrier to decreasing the price of oil in the Middle East.

Mr. Eakens replied that on the other hand there seem to be many advantages for a 50–50 arrangement. It would represent a principle on which companies could base their negotiating positions. Such an arrangement would also have an appeal to fairness and equity. It would allow the companies to point out that the transit countries are being accorded the same treatment as producing countries. And, finally, it would represent a strategic line for restricting demand by the countries for larger and larger payments.

Mr. Armstrong agreed that the present system of bargaining holds the seeds of trouble in that no principles are being utilized by either the companies or the countries. There is now no logical way of arguing that one solution is more just than another. This would seem to allow the countries to continue to raise their demands in the future without restriction.

Mr. Hart, however, cautioned that it is misleading to apply Western principles of fairness, equality and logic to the situation that now applies in the Middle East. The companies face in that area demands arising out of internal social and political pressures and it is very doubtful whether abiding by formulas in negotiations can defeat these demands for petroleum products. He questioned whether a solution might not be to make available supplies of cheap products in those areas.
